THE OATHS BILL.—Sir F. THESIGER said it might be convenient to the House for him to state the course he intended to take in reference to the Parliamentary Oaths Bill, the second reading of which was fixed for Monday next. On considering the proposed paper and books used for the purposes of education, to propose any measure for granting a drawback on the paper-duty, or repealing paper and books used for the purposes of education?—The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said he had no intention at present of proposing such a measure.

CHURCH-RATES.—Lord FALKLAND, in reply to Sir J. Trelawny, said it was his intention to introduce a bill this Session for the abolition of Church-rates.

THE OATHS BILL.—Sir F. THESIGER said it might be convenient to the House for him to state the course he intended to take in reference to the Parliamentary Oaths Bill, the second reading of which was fixed for Monday next. On considering the proposed form of oath under this bill, his friends and himself thought it a great improvement on the existing oaths. Its only fault was that it did not go far enough, inasmuch as it might be taken by parties who were not Christians. They would not under these circumstances oppose the second reading of the bill; but in Committee he would propose an amendment with a view to preserve the Christian character of the House.

VOTING PAPERS.

Lord R. CECIL moved for a Select Committee to inquire into the expediency of collecting the votes at elections in counties and universities by way of voting papers. He particularly instanced the manner in which voting under the Poor-law system had worked as a recommendation of his motion.

Mr. STEPHEN seconded the motion.

Mr. M'CULLAGH thought the Poor-law system was inapplicable to Parliamentary elections, and cited many instances in which there had been gross irregularities in the election of guardians. He concluded by moving the previous question.

Mr. BOWYER seconded the amendment.

Lord ERNEST BRUCE thought that many of the frauds complained of resulted from the inefficiency of the machinery employed under the Poor-law in the collection of votes. These and similar questions seemed to him properly referable to a Committee.

Lord STANLEY said that if the motion had been limited to 'the universities he should not have opposed it; but he did not think it would be right to make a difference between counties and boroughs in the mode of voting, and he could not therefore vote for the motion as it stood.

Sir E. KELLY strongly supported the motion.

Sir G. GREY objected to the appointment of a Select Committee for such a purpose, believing that the result of such an inquiry would leave the question just where it stood at present. If the noble Lord had asked leave to introduce a Bill, he should not, certainly, have opposed the motion, being willing to suspend his judgment upon the matter until he saw the nature of the measure to be proposed by the noble Lord.

Mr. HENLEY warned his friends against supposing that the noble Lord contemplated any measure of reform in the direction of the ballot.

Lord J. MANNERS was opposed to the motion, and urged the noble Lord not to press it to a division.

Lord R. CECIL then withdrew his motion.

THE BOARD OF TRADE.

Mr. HORSFALL moved for a Select Committee to inquire into the origin, the uses and present constitution, and the powers and duties of the Board of Trade, with the view to its better adaptation to the requirements of the country. The hon. gentleman contended at great length that the constitution of the Board of Trade was such as precluded its keeping pace with the commerce of the country, and the result was great injury to the shipping and other interests, as was evident in the case of the Liverpool and Birkenhead docks, the obstruction to the completion of which led to the delay of ships for weeks at a heavy expense, which might have been saved, had the docks been constructed. The Board of Trade had a great deal too much to do, and an inquiry was absolutely necessary to adopt some means of rendering its constitution equal to the services required at its hands.

Mr. LABOUCHERE contended that the hon. gentleman had made out no case whatever for an inquiry, nor had he pointed out any one way in which the constitution of the Board of Trade could be improved, unless, indeed, their principle were to be admitted that no one not engaged in trade and commerce could be competent to perform the functions of the Board of Trade—a principle which could not be admitted, for the very contrary was the principle which had always been recognised and acted upon. The principle, jealously guarded, always had been that no one who had an interest in commerce should be connected with the Board of Trade, and he hoped that the principle would ever be maintained. He thought that the hon. gentleman could hardly intend to press his motion, for the question was, in fact, one for the House itself, and not for a Committee, to decide upon.

Sir J. GRAHAM bore testimony to the great services which the Board of Trade had conferred upon the country.

Mr. BENTINCK contended that Mr. Horsfall had made out a case for inquiry.

Sir G. PECHELL said the Board of Trade had not only too much to do, but it did too much, and instanced cases in which much mischief had resulted from its interference.

Mr. LOWE defended the Board of Trade, and denied that there was any necessity for its reconstruction.

After some remarks from Mr. BASS, Mr. J. EWART, and Mr. Hadfield, Mr. Horsfall's motion was negatived without a division.

THE WORKING CLASSES.

Mr. SCHOLEFIELD moved for the appointment of a Standing Committee or unpaid Commission, to consider and report from time to time on practical suggestions (free from party differences), to give facilities for improvement in the social condition of the working classes.

Sir G. GREY opposed the proposition as impracticable, and calculated to raise expectations which could not be realised.

Mr. SCHOLEFIELD then withdrew his motion.

Mr. STANLEY then withdrew his motion for an ALEHOUSE AND BEERHOUSE LICENSING.—Mr. ATHERTON, in Committee of the whole House, obtained leave to bring in a Bill to Explain and Amend the Act to Regulate the Granting of Licenses to Keepers of Inns, Alehouses, and Victualling Houses in England. The bill was a declaratory one merely to make the existing law more clear.

INTERESTS OF MARRIED WOMEN.—Mr. MALINS obtained leave to bring in a bill to enable married women to dispose of reversionary interests in personal estate.

A PORTION of the 93rd Highlanders, about 350 officers and men, embarked at Portsmouth on Monday on board the steam-tenders Pigmy, Sprightly, and Alban, for conveyance to Plymouth, where the Belleisle troop-ship is waiting to take them to China.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

VISITATION OF THE ARCHDEACON OF MIDDLESEX.—On Thursday morning the Venerable John Sinclair, M.A., Archdeacon of Middlesex, held a visitation of the clergy of the Archdeaconry at St. Paul's Church, Covent garden. There was a large attendance of the clergy. The Archdeacon holds a visitation for the remainder of his archdeconry at the same church on Saturday (to-day).

INCORPORATED CHURCH-BUILDING SOCIETY.—On Friday (last week) the thirty-ninth annual meeting of the members of this society was held at 79, Pall-mall the Archbishop of Canterbury in the chair. The report stated that during the past year assistance had been accorded to 118 places, the sum granted for which was £13,439, and the accommodation obtained 23,626 sittings; fourteen new districts, hitherto unprovided with a church, had been sided. The committee regretted that the annual subscriptions did not amount to more than £2000 per annum, and that a liberal response had not been made to the pastoral letters issued by the episcopate.

SAILORS' ORPHAN GIRLS' SCHOOL AND HOME.—The annual meeting of the friends and supporters of this charity was held on Monday at the Thatched House Tavern, St. James's-street. The Hon. A. Kinnaird, M.P., in the chair. The report stated that the general sanitary condition of the institution was excellent. One of the principal objects of the institution was to train the children in the knowledge of domestic duties. Twenty-four girls were employed in the house, discharge all the duties of the kitchen, scullery, laundry, and dormitory. Attached to the school was a temporary home for former pupils who were received when out of a situation. During the year a new infirmary had been erected. At the close of the proceedings the children sang the National Anthem.

THE STRANGERS' HOME FOR ASIATICS, AFRICANS, AND SOUTH SEA ISLANDERS.—The opening of the building erected for the purposes of this institution, in the West India Dock-road, Limehouse, took place on Wednesday.

THE LADIES' INSTITUTION OF THE UNITED KINGDOM FOR FEMALE IDIOTS.—This institution has been for some time established at Zion House, Turnham-green, under the auspices of Mrs Leander, the original founder and promoter of the Asylum for Idiots, for the purpose of receiving as inmates those who have been dismissed from the latter establishment. In aid of the funds a bazaar and fancy sale was held on Tuesday and Wednesday upon the premises, which was most numerously attended. The band of the third district of Middlesex Militia were present to enliven the whole scene, and went off with great effect.

THE WORCESTERSHIRE SOCIETY partook of their annual dinner on Friday, the 29th May—James Capel, Esq., in the chair. Among the distinguished visitors were the Right Hon. Sir Fitzroy Kelly, the Right Hon. Sir John Pakington, Bart., M.P.; Lord Viscount Elmley, M.P.; Hon W. Coventry, Lord W. Lennox, Hon. R. Clive, M.P., and other gentlemen connected with the counties. The object of this valuable society is "for apprenticing children of necessitous persons natives of the county resident in London or its vicinity, and for lending them a sum of money at the expiration of their apprenticeship to establish them in business, if their conduct shall have been meritorious." Immediately after the cloth was withdrawn a number of the lads who had been recipients of the benefits of the society entered the room, and acknowledged the benefits they had received from the society. Mr. Capel, the excellent chairman, urged the claims of this society on the gentlemen present in an effective manner. Several new subscribers were added to the list, and the evening was spent in a most agreeable manner.

UNITED ASSOCIATION OF SCHOOLMASTERS.—On Saturday last a general meeting of this association was held at St. Martin's Hall—Mr. Tunnell, Inspector of Schools, in the chair. Mr. A. Moseley, master of the Children's Establishment, Limehouse, delivered a lecture on "Education as the Means of Preventing Crime and Destitution."

THE ETHNOLOGICAL SOCIETY.—The anniversary meeting of this society was held on the 26th of May. The report of the council of the past year announced a very considerable improvement in its financial and other prospects; and the following gentlemen were elected officers and council for the year ensuing:—President, Sir James Clark, Bart.; Vice-Presidents: the Archbishop of Dublin; Sir Benjamin Brodie, Bart.; the Hon. Mountstuart Elphinstone; Berlin Bonfield, M.P. Treasurer: Frederick Hindmarch, F.R.G.S. Hon. Secretary; Thomas Wright, M.A., F.S.A. Council: W. F. Ainsworth, L. J. Beale, C. H. Bracebridge, Major-General Briggs, J. S. Coleman; J. Conolly, M.D. E. Ingham, M.P.; James Kennedy; D. King, M.D.; Malcolm Lewin, Lieut.-General Sir Chas. Pasley, Rev. E. J. Selwyn, J. J. Stainton, R. Tait, C. D. Tolmé T. H. Tuke, M.D.

GENEALOGICAL AND HISTORICAL SOCIETY OF GREAT BRITAIN.—The annual general meeting of the above society was held on Saturday last—W. Hart, Esq., in the chair. The meeting was attended by a considerable number of gentlemen. A letter was read from Lord Bateman, Sir Edmund Prideaux, Bart., and several other gentlemen unable to attend. The annual report was read and adopted, and thanks voted to the author. It was laid on the table and ordered to be printed. A donation of books was received from the Rev. Mr. Trollope, and the receipt of several works for the library was also acknowledged, and a vote of thanks to the donors. Several ancient documents; the whole of which were very highly approved. A discussion of much interest arose in reference to the great increase of the society's means of obtaining information from all parts of England, the members throughout Great Britain and the Continent. A vote of thanks to the chairman and secretary terminated the business of the meeting.

LAYING THE FOUNDATION-STONE OF THE CLOCK AND WATCH MAKERS' ASYLUM.—On Saturday last the ceremony of laying the foundation stone of the above asylum took place upon a most eligible piece of land beautifully situate at Colney-batch, near the Great Northern Railway station—Sir. J. Duke, M.P. for the City of London, presiding. The asylum, which will be in the Tudor style of architecture, formed of red brick, decorated with stone dressings, is from a design by Mr. Robert Palgrave, architect; and is intended to provide a home, with fuel and light, and an annual pension of £20 to the men, and £13 to the widows, for such as may be elected by the subscribers. It is proposed to build thirteen houses immediately, and subsequently to increase the number. The subscriptions announced amounted to a considerable sum, in addition to £2000 already contributed.

HOME TEACHING FOR THE BLIND.—A meeting, under the presidency of the Earl of Shaftesbury, was held at Willis's Rooms, on Wednesday afternoon, in aid of the society for providing home teachers and books in Moon's type to enable the blind to read the Scriptures The society was begun as an experiment in September, 1855; and, having proved successful after six months' trial, a provisional committee was appointed, and the society regularly formed. The first teacher was a blind man, who was able to teach after one month; the second teacher was also a blind man, who was able to teach after six months; and in eighteen months they had taught reading to 117 of 236 pupils, and 13 were still learning. Some of the blind who attended excited considerable surprise by the fluency with which they read passages from the New Testament, and much admiration was awakened by the singing of three of Mr. Moon's female pupils from the British and Foreign Blind Asylum, who sang solos and trios from the oratorios of Haydn and Handel, and Rossini's "Charity," their instructress, Madame de Fauche, accompanying them on the piano. The meeting was largely attended, chiefly by ladies.

ST. CLEMENT DANES.—The usual anniversary (being the 157th) of the charity schools of this parish was celebrated at the Freemasons' Hall on Thursday, when the Vicar, H. Wagner, Esq., M.A., occupied the chair. After the usual patriotic toasts (accompanied with appropriate songs, well sung by the Misses Clara Holmes and Somerville, and Messrs. Thomas and Holman), and those of the Lord Curates of the parish, the Rev. Mr. Mason described the progress of the schools, and the benefit they had bestowed on the rising population of the parish. Mr. Simpson then read the report, particularly in relation to the number of girls educated, which had been increased to the number of thirty-five. On "The prosperity of the schools" being proposed by Mr. Stilwell, the girls were then introduced, and sung in a most satisfactory manner, "O come ye into the summer woods," and the "Last rose of summer." Their appearance was highly gratifying, and the whole proceedings were highly honourable to the conductors and trustees of the schools.

THE FALL OF HOUSES IN TOTTENHAM-COURT-ROAD.—On Thursday the investigation into the deaths of the six unfortunate persons who lost their lives by the falling of three houses in Tottenham-court-road was the immediate cause of the inquest by Mr. Brent, the Deputy Coroner, at Lawson's Rooms, Upper Gower-street. Some witnesses having been examined, the Coroner carefully summed up the voluminous evidence which he had received during several days' sitting. The jury, after nearly three hours' deliberation, returned the following verdict:—"That the deaths of the deceased persons, Frederick King, Ann Driscoll, John Garnett, Richard Turner, James Kivell, and Joseph Taylor, were caused by the falling of the houses 146, 147, and 148, Tottenham-court-road. That the cutting of the holes in the wall between 147 and 148 was the immediate cause of Mr Brent, the Deputy Coroner, at Lawson's Rooms, Upper Gower-street. Some witnesses having been examined, the Coroner carefully summed up the voluminous evidence which he had received during several days' sitting. The jury, after nearly three hours' deliberation, returned the following verdict:—"That the deaths of the deceased persons, Frederick King, Ann Driscoll, John Garnett, Richard Turner, James Kivell, and Joseph Taylor, were caused by the falling of the houses 146, 147, and 148, Tottenham-court-road. That the cutting of the holes in the wall between 147 and 148 was the immediate cause of the accident—the party-wall between 147 and 148 being very indifferent, requiring more than ordinary caution, which in this case was not used. That the cutting away of the party-wall between 147 and 148 was done in an unskilful and improper manner. The jury cannot separate without expressing their strong condemnation of the [illegible] conflicting state of the law as to district and police surveyors, [illegible] appear to be quite independent, and even [illegible] and [illegible] sincerely hope that an immediate alteration will be made in the Building Act as constituted."

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE Derby settling has far exceeded expectation, and, although Mr. Davis got hard hit, he followed his usual practice of paying on the Monday, and, entering the room with £20,000, quitted it with only £15! Mr. Hill is said to have lost but little, and the owner of Anton reduced the very heavy balance against him by a Blink Bonny and Malacca double event bet. There seem to be historic doubts as to Mr. Drinkald's renowned Bath bet. Some say it was £10,000 to a suit of clothes and a hat, while others will have it that it was £10,000 to a suit of clothes and a bottle of soda-water. The "Sussex gentleman" is said to be hit for £98,000, but it is hopeless to sever truth from falsehood in these matters. In the Oaks, Blink Bonny fairly run away from everything two distances from home, the elegant Sneeze not getting within ten lengths of her. Mestissima, who has been "off" since Newmarket, and will see a better day, third; and Impériense, who is no great stayer, fourth. Blink Bonny is Queen Mary's eighth foal, and is great-grandchild of the twenty-seven-year-old Myrrha, the only Whalebone mare left. Her party considered the Newmarket running far too bad to be true; and after her trial at 7 lbs. with Strathnaver, on the Saturday before the Derby, Mr. J'Anson got on £4,000 at 40 to 1, and won a large sum in all. ## TOWN AND TABLE TALK ON LITERATURE, ART, &c.

HER Majesty, it is now definitively settled, will spend two days in Manchester during the present month. The days fixed are Monday, the 29th, and Tuesday, the 30th. It is understood that the first day will be a public visit; the second as private as the Executive Committee and the good sense of the Manchester people can possibly make it.

We called attention some time back to a particular picture in the Art-Treasures Exhibition, said to be by Turner, labelled as such in black and gold by its owner, but really a picture from the easel of Mr. Stark. We now direct attention to another picture, a so-called ancient master, in the same collection, attributed to Paul Brill, praised as such by a critic who cannot be mistaken (only ask Mr. Morris Moore), and hung as genuine by English judges, on whom the English public continue to place a very proper alliance. Observe and note very carefully, we are told, a particular picture in Saloon C of the ancient masters, contributed by Lord Carlisle from the Castle Howard Collection. It is a landscape, catalogued as a Paul Brill, and praised as such by Dr. Waagen in his book about pictures in England. Now, having looked at the picture, we are told, further, to observe that it is not by Paul Brill at all, but only a clever imitation, or cento, made by John Jackson, the famous portrait-painter, when a young man. The canvas, we are assured, is of Jackson's date, not Paul Brill's; and Jackson, it is well known, was patronised through life by the leading lords of his native Yorkshire—Lord Mulgrave and Lord Carlisle. Funny, indeed, if the Doctor has been really taken in (but he is seldom wrong). Will not Mr. Morris Moore rejoice?

Mr. Dickens has brought "Little Dorrit" to an end, and if every expectation that was raised about its conduct and its close has not been made good the public has no right to be displeased with its writer, or otherwise than grateful to one who has done so much and so well to gladden and instruct all who speak "words which wise Bacon or brave Raleigh spake." There was great good sense in the recent remark of a well-known writer who was asked "What he thought of 'Little Dorrit,' now that it was ended?" His reply was, "I like it the best of all Mr. Dickens's works." Being charged with what his friend was pleased to call the exorbitancy of his praise, he observed, with an intelligent smile, "Why, I always like that book the best of Mr. Dickens's which I read the last."

The labour and anxiety of the Art-Treasures Exhibition have hurried two men of mark to premature graves. Mr. Kemble died while in harness for the Manchester men, and Mr. Edward Holmes was buried on Saturday last within sight of Manchester. The laborious task for which by taste he was so well fitted, that of selecting and arranging chronologically the best examples of English water-colour art, was intrusted to Mr. Holmes. When near the end of his labours, disease stepped in and unfitted him bodily for what he was about. Yet he still worked on, and walked in the procession before Prince Albert on the opening day. It was easy to see, in the words of the old ballad, that "Death was with him dealing," and that he had not long to live. Poor fellow! he is no longer among us. The men of Manchester, as was to be expected, have behaved like men of feeling to the widow of an able officer who died thus prematurely while in their service.

If some sculptors are suffered to have their way, St. Paul's as a piece of architecture will be sadly disfigured with a monument to the Duke of Wellington. Instead of thinking of Sir Christopher Wren at the same moment with Wellington and themselves, some sculptors (we forbear to name them) are entirely ignoring Wren, just as sculptors in the last century forgot our grand old Gothic architects when busy with monuments pancake monuments as they are called—for Winchester or Westminster Abbey. We hope Dean Milman and Mr. Penrose will both of them have a word to say about the monument in St. Paul's to the Duke. Both have a right to be heard on such a point beyond their official connection with St. Paul's—both are men of fine natural and cultivated tastes.

A contemporary, who gives his days and nights not to Addison but Pope, has just published a little discovery of moment that will gratify the many admirers of the nightingale of Twickenham. Pope's sister-in-law, or half sister, was not, as has hitherto been supposed, the daughter of his mother by a previous marriage, but the daughter of his father by a previous marriage. Old Alexander Pope's first wife died in London, in 1679, and was buried in the church of St. Benet Fink, recently swallowed up by Mr. Tite's Royal Exchange approaches. Her Christian name, it appears from the burial entry, quoted by our contemporary, was Magdalen (so was her daughter's); her other name is unknown. The other discovery to which our contemporary gives such undue prominence—that Pope's father was a merchant in Broad-street, London, in 1677—has been a patent fact for many years. Mr. Bolton Corney, we are sure, with his customary politeness, will be delighted to shew our contemporary the little volume containing the fact we mention.

Having copied from a contemporary a discovery of moment connected with an English poet, we will here insert a very curious paper, hitherto unpublished and unreferred to, connected with King Charles I. and the celebrated painter, Daniel Mytens. It is the more curious because it contains the earliest evidence we possess of King Charles's love for the fine arts. When this was written, "the grey, discrowned, Monarch" was only Prince of Wales, and in his twenty-fifth year. The paper is entitled

CHARLES PRINCE OF WALES' GRANT TO DANIEL MYTENS.

Righitte thrustie and welbeloved wee greet you well. Dated at Newmarkett 30 Decem. 1624.

Sr Henry Hobart, Kt. &c.

When we read this we reflect how appropriate is the locality which Charles assigned to Mytens. Vansomer had lived there; and long after Mytens had left it, in the same precinct, perhaps in the same house, was established the St. Martin's-lane Academy, the original of the Royal Academy of Arts now in Trafalgar-square, and (will Sir Charles Eastlake excuse us?) at the bottom of St. Martin's-lane.

On the 28th ult. the Sardinian Senate passed a bill for the abolition of the usury laws.

MUSIC.

A NEW performer has appeared at HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE—Signor Corsi, a barytone of considerable Continental reputation, who made his début in this country on Tuesday last. Verdi's "Nabucconasor," or "Nino" as it is called here, was revived on this occasion. This opera, it may be remembered, was produced at this theatre some nine or ten years ago; and, as scriptural subjects cannot be brought upon our stage, the captivity of the Israelites in Babylon under Nebuchadnezzar was changed into an imaginary captivity of the Babylonians in Assyria, under a certain King Ninus, or Nino. Under the pride of Ninus, like that of Nebuchadnezzar, is rebuked by the judgment of Heaven; and the miraculous interposition of Providence in behalf of the true believers takes place in this ridiculous perversion of the subject in favour of one set of idolators against another, to the utter destruction of all dramatic interest. The opera, even in its original state, is a very poor one, the music not rising even to the usual level of Verdi. When formerly brought out at this theatre, it was the reverse of successful; and, when afterwards produced at the Royal Italian Opera under a different title, and with a different but equally absurd perversion of the subject it likewise failed egregiously, notwithstanding all the care and splendour with which it was got up. We think, therefore, that Mr. Lumley has scarcely shown his usual judgment in attempting the revival of a worthless opera—an attempt which cannot but be attended with another failure. Nor was there occasion to produce it for the sake of Signor Corsi. It is in the character of Rigoletto that he has achieved his great success; and, had this opera been now produced at Her Majesty's Theatre, it would not only have shown Signor Corsi to the greatest advantage, but would have served to counterbalance the great attraction of "Rigoletto" at the Royal Italian Opera. Nevertheless, afforded Signor Corsi the opportunity of showing himself a first-rate artist. He is a large thick-set man, and, in his person, the Assyrian monarch did not look very kingly. But his head is striking, his features are expressive, and his action has great force and energy. In the scene where the mighty King is stricken to the earth by the curse of Heaven his acting was fine, and, but for the absurd perversion of the subject, would have been deeply pathetic. His voice is at once powerful and sweet, and he uses it like an accomplished artist. We hope he will soon appear in some character more worthy of him. In the very unpleasing character of Abigaele, the haughty, usurping slave, Mdlle. Spezia displayed much dramatic as well as vocal power. Her action was bold and energetic, and, from her execution of the music, it was evident that it was quite familiar to her. We never before heard her shew so much strength of voice. This, indeed, is the one thing needful in Verdi's music; and the consequence is, that the singers of the present Italian school strain their voices till they very soon wear them out. We should be sorry should this catastrophe happen to Mdlle. Spezia, who has many fine qualities; but she seems in some danger of it. The other principal parts, performed by Mdlle. Ramos and Mr. Charles Braham, do not call for any remark.

THE début of the interesting young singer, Mdlle. Victoire Balfe, has been as successful as her warmest friends could desire. She appeared before the public for the first time, at the LYCEUM, on Thursday last week, as Amina, in the "Somnambula," and repeated the same performance on Tuesday last. Her name, as the daughter of our favourite English composer, and the current reports of her talents and accomplishments, attracted an overflowing audience on the night of her début, and the highest expectations were more than realized. This young girl, not yet twenty, who never in her life had encountered the public gaze, proved to be not only an exquisite singer but an admirable actress. With a light, graceful figure, a face beaming with intelligence and feeling, a voice which (though it has not yet gained its full strength) is music in its very sound, and, above all, the freshness and charm of early youth, her personation of the rustic heroine was inexpressibly captivating, and excited the audience to enthusiasm. The excessive timidity under which she laboured for a time seemed only to render her more interesting; and when she retired at the conclusion of the piece it was amid cheers and acclamations from every part of the house. On Tuesday evening her performance was equally beautiful, and her reception equally flattering. We hope, however, that Mr. Balfe's good sense will save her from the dangers of over-exertion. She is evidently a delicate girl, and unable as yet to undergo the wear and tear of theatrical life.

THE PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY'S fourth concert of the season took place, at the Hanover-square Rooms, on Monday evening. The programme included Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, Mozart's symphony in E flat, Bennett's overture, the "Naiades," and Rossini's overture to "The Siege of Corinth," all of which were performed in a style which we have never heard surpassed. Sivori (who was detained from Paris for this concert) played Mendelssohn's violin concerto, and a fantasia of his own, descriptive of Carnival scenes at Madrid. He displayed all his marvellous and (in some respects) unrivalled powers, and was received with unabated enthusiasm. Madame Sainton-Dolby, prima donna of the Royal Opera at Brussels, made her first public appearance in this country; and, by her performance of Beethoven's famous scena, "Ah, perfido," and a brilliant air from the French opera, "Le Caïd," showed herself a singer of a very high order.

THE NEW PHILHARMONIC had their third and last concert at the same place on Wednesday evening. Its principal features were Beethoven' magnificent symphony in B flat, and Mozart's serenade in C minor, for eight wind instruments; a charming work, new to the English public in its original form, but not unknown to our concert-rooms as a quintet for stringed instruments. Madame Gassier sang two airs of Rossini and Bellini with her usual brilliancy.

AT the MUSICAL UNION, on Tuesday, the novelty was Madame Schumann's performance (accompanied by Ernst and Piatti) of Beethoven's Grand Trio, in E flat, Op. 70, and Mendelssohn's Sonata Capriccioso in E minor. This most accomplished pianist has been too little heard among us this season. We believe she takes her departure very soon; but, before she leaves, she is to give a morning concert at the Hanover-square Rooms on Thursday next.

THE principal benefit concert of the week has been Miss Delby and Mr. Lindsay Sloper's, at the Hanover-square Rooms, on Wednesday morning. It was an elegant and highly-classical entertainment, attended by an overflowing assemblage of the most fashionable company in town.

MR. AND MRS. HOWARD PAUL give their comic and musical entertainment, "Patchwork," at Nottingham during the coming week.

JULLIEN'S SUMMER CONCERTS.—M. Jullien has announced his intention to make a tour in the provinces next month, for the purpose of giving a series of open-air concerts. Amongst the towns he is about to visit are Hull, Leeds, Liverpool, Manchester, and other places in the manufacturing districts. In addition to M. Jullien's powerful orchestra he will have the assistance of military bands and popular vocalists, the attractions of Astley's Hippodrome, and Darby's pyrotechnic displays.

THE THEATRES, &c.

HAYMARKET.—Mr. Falconer, the author of "The Cagot," has further justified his dramatic claims by a new production, in two acts, which was acted on Monday. The subject and manners of the piece are French. It is called "A Husband for an Hour." The husband, for a wonder, is the stage hero, and received the assistance of Mr Buckstone's talent as his representative. In the first act he appears as a gardener; in the second as a count. Here is a contrast of approved efficiency; at the end of the first act, also, he is supposed to be dead; at the beginning of the second he is witnessed to be living; here is another, certain to tell, however often repeated. The gardener, Robert, is secretly attached to Julie, the well-practised Marguis, should challenge the titled villain; which he does, and, as a matter of course, gets run through the body. To the credit of Julie, it must be stated that such a result was not premeditated; nevertheless, she is made, by the intervention of Le Clerq, to feel that she has acted as if it had been, and her remorse is poignant. She secludes herself from the world for three years. Meanwhile Count Robert, who is reported dead, labours hard to educate himself, so as to become fit for his new position; and succeeds so well that, on his reappearance, he is the superior of the Marquis in the end. The Countess, on the solicitation of friends, has consented to be present at a party of fashionables in her honour, when the Marquis has the impudence to urge again his claims to the hand of the widowed Countess; but she is really high-minded, and treats him with scorn. Count Robert, in the dress and under the name of an English Lord Thornley, is at the party, and proves indeed a thorn in the side of the Marquis, and a passage of arms takes place between them, when the latter is worsted. Julie is grateful—something more, perhaps—to her benefactor. But it is expedient to test the real state of her feelings, and Count Robert appears again in the dress of the gardener, claims her as his wife, and affects a rudeness which offends. He returns, therefore, to his anglican and noble disguise, and again charms. Nothing now remains but to demonstrate that the rude horticulturist and the polished aristocrat are the same person, whereupon all parties are made happy, except the Marquis, who has earned shame and misery by his misconduct. An underplot, in which the servants go through the same phases, in an inferior type, as their employers, serves to vary the current of sentiment, and introduces the fun that always arises from the exhibition of "high life below stairs." The reader will perceive that such a story is interesting in itself, and, with the aid of good acting and good scenery, could not easily fail of success. In all probability a prolonged run attends this piece.

ADELPHI.—It has taken Mr. Webster many years to attain the position of a great actor; but, having arrived at the eminence, he maintains it proudly and surely. On Wednesday he gave the public another example how well he can support and realise a life-hero throughout five acts, in every variety of biographical exigence. The drama provided for this purpose has been written by M. Bourcicault, and is entitled "George Darville." It is the story of a young sculptor, who, too impatient to earn wealth gradually by his profession, eagerly seizes on the accident of finding a large sum of money, and on the strength of it becomes an opulent and married man. Meanwhile the loser of the pocket-book in which the cash was contained, not being able to account satisfactorily for it to his employers for the deficiency, is driven to despair and commits suicide. Darville becomes aware of this fact just on the eve of his marriage, and hence assumes the aspect of a man pecuniarily by a constant remorse. At this point Mr. Webster's elaborate acting commences, and it proceeds gradually by his profession, eagerly seizes on the accident of finding a large sum of money, and on the strength of it becomes an opulent and married man. Meanwhile the loser of the pocket-book in which the cash was contained, not being able to account satisfactorily for it to his employers for the deficiency, is driven to despair and commits suicide. Darville becomes aware of this fact just on the eve of his marriage, and hence assumes the aspect of a man pecuniarily by a constant remorse. At this point Mr. Webster's elaborate acting commences, and it proceeds gradually to win for himself the laurels of a dramatic artist; nor has he long to wait his guerdon; for his triumph, in which Madame Celeste shared, was secured at the end of the third act. Mrs. Darville has, by means of the fatal pocket-book, identified her husband in the transaction, and seeks to repair the wrong by appropriating some of the notes in it to the son of its former possessor, then a clerk under a feigned name in her husband's employ. In the portrayal of this character Madame Celeste has many phases of feeling to depict, and indeed rivals Mr. Webster in the skill with which she manages details of the most intricate description. The two last acts sustain the interest of the plot admirably to the end. Darville becomes a sufferer from many passions. Jealousy, remorse, despair exert their influence upon him. He comes, too, into communication with the robber (Mr. Paul Bedford) who had thrown the packet at his feet and claimed half the contents, and ultimately discovers that his wife is acquainted with his guilty secret. He flees from his home, and contemplates suicide, in which he is prevented by his wife, who follows his steps and who dies in his arms. This is the catastrophe of the piece. To gain her he was induced to appropriate the treasure of another; and his punishment is, by means of that same wealth, to lose her. The moral is a solemn and severe one; and too gloomy indeed would have been the drama which conveyed it, but that the author has adroitly thrown in some comic scenes, in which Mr. Wright and Miss Wyndham, with a numerous family of sons and daughters, the accumulations of ten years, are provided with ample opportunities for exhibiting an abundance of humours. Admirably acted throughout, this well-conceived and capitally-written drama will doubtless rival "Janet Pride" in popularity. The performance was for the benefit of Mdme. Celeste, who was rewarded by an overflowing house, and honoured by an unusual "exposition" of bouquets.

ST. JAMES'S.—The opera of "Dragonette" was performed on Saturday, when Mdlle. Corally Guffroy appeared as the heroine, a military young lady, brought up by an old sergeant in true military style, who, in the course of the incidents, assumes the garb of her brother, and thus conceals the fact of his having been absent without leave. In this character she incurs the peril of a quarrel, about a fair vivandière—in whom a conscript dancing-master has an interest—during which she faints; but her brother arrives just in time, when they rush into one another's arms. Whether as boy or girl, Mdlle. C. Guffroy supports the character with much delicacy and grace, and adopts the manners of the camp with a pretty readiness that commands applause. The humours of the dancing master are grotesquely rendered by M. Tejan; and music, which is by Herr Ofenbach, is appropriate, and filled with the true martial spirit.

DRURY LANE.—The morning performance at this theatre, on Wednesday, was attended by a crowded audience, by whom the equestrian feats of Ella, and the balloon and hurdle races, were evidently enjoyed. The evening performances throughout the week have proved very attractive.

THE FLOWER SHOW AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

A FASHIONABLE crowd filled the Crystal Palace on Saturday last, attracted thither by the first flower show of the season, to which was added the display of the whole system of waterworks. The arrangement of the flowers was admirable. A double stand ran from the centre of the building to the crystal fountain on the south and the arboretum on the north, and another was placed in the east transept opposite the great centre. On these the flowers were ranged in triple rows, and the effect produced as the eye ranged along them was beautiful in the extreme. And, viewed from the gallery, almost magical. At one glance was embraced an extensive mass of flowers of every imaginable hue, flanked on each side by the delicate orange and other choice trees, the usual denizens of the Palace, and moving among them were crowds of ladies attired in graceful and elegant costumes, all making up a scene of surpassing beauty and loveliness. In the transept the azaleas were in the ascendant. A more beautiful collection of this exuberant flower was rarely witnessed. As you approached it had the appearance of one monster bouquet, so thickset and profuse was the bloom, the tints varying from the truest white to the deepest crimson. On the stand immediately south from the transept was a display of fruit—small but most choice; huge grapes, magnificent pines, immense strawberries, and tempting nectarines and peaches. Next came the collection of gloxinias, with their thimble-like flowers and variegated stems. Further on were lilies, aphenexia, fuchsias, and calceolarias. On the stand to the north were collections of orchids, delicate ferns, and herbaceous cacti. The tulips were few in number, but perfect in form and rich in colour. After the flower show came the display of the fountains; and the whole played successfully for more than twenty minutes—the sky, which had been cloudy, clearing off just as the grand jet made its appearance. The Crystal Palace orchestra and two military bands played at intervals throughout the day. The weather proved propitious; and the fête was completely successful. There were present on the occasion 3705 half-guinea visitors, and 8228 season-ticket holders; making a total of 12,933.

A THIRSTY MODEL AND A MANCHESTER ARTIST.—The Manchester Guardian, in its notice of one of the pictures at the Exhibition, tells the following amusing anecdote of Liversedge the artist, who was a native of that city:—Liversedge was always anxious to find characteristic models, and had some trouble in discovering a suitable head for the drunken tinker of the "Induction to the Taming of the Shrew." At length he found a cobbler that he thought would suit, when well primed with liquor, and set him in his studio in the proper attitude, with a bottle of gin beside him, and permission to drink whenever he pleased. The bottle of gin was soon emptied, but the cobbler continued as sober as a judge. Another bottle was brought and emptied, with no better result. "Be off!" cried Liversedge, at last, in a passion; "it will cost more to make you drunk than the picture will fetch."

OATHS AND WITNESSES BEFORE THE HOUSE OF LORDS.—A report has just been published by the select committee appointed to consider and report on the expediency of altering the present mode of administering oaths to witnesses to be examined by committees of the House. The committee have unanimously agreed to the following resolutions:—"That it is expedient to discontinue the practice of examining witnesses on oath before committees in all cases in which the administration of an oath does not appear to the House necessary for the purposes of the inquiry. The committee ought, therefore, in future to examine the witnesses without their having been previously sworn, except in cases in which it may be otherwise ordered by the House. That as the inquiries before committees on private bills involve questions of fact in which pecuniary interests are concerned, it is expedient that such committees should be directed by a standing order to examine witnesses on oath, except in cases in which it may be otherwise ordered by the House."

DR. LANDLE, of Athens, states that from ten to twelve drops of chloroform, in a little water, is an unfailing remedy in sea-sickness. One dose has been known to give immediate relief.

SOCIETY OF FEMALE ARTISTS, OXFORD-STREET.

CLASSIFICATION is the necessary consequence of the great expansion of art-production in our own times: it therefore gives us pleasure to see the commencement of a series of exhibitions calculated to show the female talent in the country. With so fair a commencement we cannot doubt that they may take a permanent hold on the public attention. Strength of will and power of creation belonging rather to the other sex, we do not of course look for the more daring efforts in an exhibition of female artists; but observation, taste, or the art of selection, and various other qualities adapted to the style, are to be found in this Oxford-street display. In some instances art-history shows that the other sex possesses the element of power. The Germanic race has sent forth Angelica Kauffmann; the French have Rosa Bonheur; and as a very fair specimen of what a woman can do, a female we call attention to No. 35 in this exhibition, "The Highland Emigrants" of Mrs. McIan, who has filled so honourable a place in our art-schools, and is the widow of a true-hearted Caledonian whose genial and versatile powers will not soon be forgotten in the Land of Cakes.

The composition of No. 35 is simple, the figures being in three masses perfectly concordant with the configuration of the land and water. The boat, moored to a shelf of Hebridean rock, has its emigrants about to depart, another group awaits its turn, and the chief, on the top of the rock, is dissolved in grief, while the piper plays "Cha till, cha till, mi tuille" (I shall return never), all stretching out their hands to the glen they will never see more, and crying, "May God put the fearful sounds out of my ears!" The whole subject is vehemently pathetic, and in drawing and expression the individual figures will stand the test of examination; in fact, one R.A., at least, in our eye might see that in this there is no histrionic exaggeration, and take a profitable lesson. But it would be no compliment to a woman of thought and power to indicate no flaws. We think, then, that the colour of the best group is good, and relieved by sparkling touches; but that there is a heaviness in the purple clouds and in the tone of the painting of the background, which is to us unpleasant. Mrs. McIan, as a woman, has seized the pathetic side of a great social question. Are we unfair or contemptuous in the case of emigration, in obedience to a great law of economic gravitation, to ask Mrs. McIan to paint two companion pictures, as prologue and epilogue to the heart-rending scene she has given us?—one representing the Celtic cottager in his despair, his indolence, his misery, and his insolvency which has dragged so many a Scotch and Irish proprietor into the slough of despond; and another picture of the same group settled in the New World in abundance and content, jingling the dollars and filling the quaigh in the pleasant prairies of the Catamaxmaniticut.

The productions of Elizabeth Murray show great talent; for instance, 260, "Idleness," a sketch of a dark-haired Spanish girl, with the very chixir of beauty in the lines of her face. 238, by the same artist, is another sylph. The niche or window in which she appears, adorned à la Misris, but with the details not renaissance but Saracenic—an agreeable variety In landscape Mrs. Elizabeth Murray is equally strong; 169, "The Tour of the Villa—Valley of Orotava, Teneriffe." Here we have a perfect seizure of the sharp outline of the sweet south at midday; it may not be so poetical as more temperate regions robed in floods of colour, but we feel that it is the literal transcript of a pleasing truth. In the other view of "Funchal, Madeira" (200), the wide-spread town on the hill and the water alive in the near tank are all admirable. Her liquids are perfect. But has not Mrs. Murray been rather too much taken with the somewhat unreal foregrounds of Turner? With every admiration of her great talents, are not her solids rather too limpid? There is a substratum of light in her solid objects, whether a wall or a pair of boots, that make them look too much like opaque Bohemian crystal. This is putting the case perhaps rather too strongly. If we indicate this rearet it is with the belief that this lady has signal capacity to avert this defect.

No. 99. "A Scene on the Coast of Ayrshire," by Mrs. Blackburn, is truth itself; there is no doubt of this being painted from nature with the resolute will neither to adorn nor alter it. We have the cold, snowy hills; the black furrow of the field; the bleak castle à la Wolf's crag, and a winter sun sending a chill light over the landscape, which is enlivened by a capital pair of plough horses, drawn with the care of loving and felicity of colour. Other clever landscapes by ladies are numerous and of every variety; such as No. 64, "Bridge at Festiniog, North Wales," by Mrs Frances Stoddart; 130, "Castle of Vancouville," by Lady Belcher; No. 81, "A Sand Storm in the Desert," by Mrs. Robertson Blaine. Altogether this exhibition is, from its being a first one, an interesting episode in the art season.

EXHIBITION OF THE ROYAL ASSOCIATION FOR THE PROMOTION OF THE FINE ARTS IN SCOTLAND.

THIS, to speak plainly, is the Edinburgh Art-Union, established so far back as 1838, so as to be the parent of all similar institutions in the United Kingdom. The exhibition in Waterloo-place comprises not only those pictures that have been selected for 1857, but also several previous works now permanently incorporated in the gallery of the Association. To this latter class belongs the "Oberon and Titania" of Mr. Noel Paton—the work that has established the reputation of the artist as the Scotchman who has attained the greatest mastery of the human form. In the details this picture is beautiful. Invention and fancy here flourish to satisfy the most exigent wish, clever drawing vanish in fifty elves and woodpeeps, to say nothing of the principal figures. But from the nature of the subject the artist has necessarily debarred himself from those qualities of concentration of action which always please. In this picture unity exists to the mind but not to the eye.

The Scottish scenes are interesting, and among them we especially remark the "Porteous Mob," by Drummond. The "Heart of Mid Lothian" has embalmed an event that otherwise would be scarcely known to the southern portion of our readers. In this picture we find a faithful reproduct of the costumes and architecture of Edinburgh. The improvised gallows, the blind piper fleeing from the fray, and all the other incidents are given with felicity of invention.

Dawn Revealing the New World to Columbus," by Harvey, is a work of higher and simpler conception; but the painting is in some respects not up to the truly dramatic power which the artist has evinced in the situation. The discoverer is a grand figure, and the dawn is poetical; but the painting is in some places weak and overmuddled. Still the picture is a noble one, and to us much preferable to his namby-pamby Covenanter.

"Inverlochy Castle," by Horatio Macculloch, and other pictures, confirm our impression that this artist is the first of resident Scotchmen as an interpreter of essentially Scottish landscape. Alexander Nasmyth, with all his brilliancy of talent, was Italian, not Scotch; his son Patrick was in art an Anglo-Dutchman; Thomson, of Duddingstone, had power, but was coarse. Macculloch has more than Thomson's large grasp of Scottish nature, and far more mastery of the arcana of the technical branches of his profession. See, for instance, in "Castle of Inverlochy"—the ricochet of sunlight from the mountain brows to the water, the feebly-gilded moss-grown walls, and the absolute truth of the pebbled beach in the broad warmth of the foreground, with all the upper air cooled by lingering clouds, like an army beaten, to be sullenly yielding ground, and having stubborn struggles on the middle heights. Mr. Macculloch has seized the essence of Highland landscape. No velvet turf nor shaggy wood serves as a framework, as in the south; but grandeur of outline and pusant association here strike on the fibres of the heart of the Caledonian.

It remains for us briefly to run over one or two other pictures. "The Shadow on the Path," by James Archer, a specimen of the minute rendering of foliage, of the modern school, but with fine light and shad.; "A Nameless Rill," by Waller A. Paton, another most painstaking work; "Skaters—Duddingston Loch," by C. Lees, one of the cleverest ice-scenes we have seen for a long period; and "Un Giorno Magro," by Houston, who appears to have gone to Italy. We congratulate him on a decided advance.

The following paintings have been purchased, in conformity with the provision of the charter which has reference to the formation of a National Gallery:—"The Quarrel of Oberon and Titania," by Noel Paton, 1850, £700; "Dawn Revealing the New World to Columbus," by Harvey, 1855, £315; "The Porteous Mob," by Drummond, 1856, £160; "Inverlochy Castle," by H. Macculloch, 1857, £200.

THE TREATMENT OF INSANITY IN SCOTLAND.

(FIRST ARTICLE.)

We have a distinct recollection of having seen, in our youth, a shaggy, bearded man, wrapped up in rugs, hastened to some kind of port in the ground by a roadside, and usually living in a hole dug out of a bank, and littered with straw. There was a cottage close at hand in which some relation dwelt, who looked after the idiot, and into which he was probably moved in bad weather; but this was his ordinary abode in the summer of years when we wandered in his neighbourhood. He excited our interest, but not that of our elders; and his existence seemed to be regarded by them as nothing unusual. Indeed, we have a faint recollection that at a little distance from the other end of the town where we lived there was a similar case. The man was fatuous, making grimaces, uttering gibberish, and greedily devouring all kinds of food he could obtain. The magnificent asylums now everywhere erected for such persons—the tender care taken of them, and of all the insane, by Dr. Connolly and other medical men—the careful supervision by the officers connected with the administration of the poor and the helpless, assure us that such cases are not now found in England; and we remark with pleasure and pride the progress which the contrast of the idiot in his cave and an idiot at Hanwell or Colney Hatch shows to have taken place. The fact has been recalled, after many years' oblivion, by reading in the Report on Lunatic Asylums in Scotland* descriptions of scenes almost similar. We quote specimens:—

D. H., at Lybster, in Caithness: Lives alone, in a small one-room cottage, where he prepares his food himself. He is insane, and fancies that attempts are made to poison him. He is a pauper, and his mother receives 12s. 6d. a quarter on his account.

R. P., aged 44, and A. P., paupers, of Dysart, live together in the village of Gallatown. Their house contains two rooms, the inner forming their bed-room. The bottom of the bed-frame consisted of loose and irregularly-placed rough boards, one of them being the outer plank of a tree, knotty and uneven. There was no mattress of any kind, nor even loose straw. The coverings were mere rags, which could afford scarcely any protection against cold. The floor was of damp earth, and that of the outer room in some parts inch-deep of water. A chair, a small ricketty table, and a cupboard constituted the entire furniture. There were no means of cooking food, and no plate or piece of crockery of any kind to hold it. The window of the inner room had no glass. The house, which belonged to the parish, presented a most depressing picture of dirt, wretchedness, and want.

These, too, were paupers; and on the representation of the Commissioners all three were provided for in asylums. The following is a case in which the mother had property, and resisted the interference of the Poor-law authorities:—

M. D., aged 25: Lives with her father and mother: they occupy a wretched room on the ground floor, a portion of which, measuring 8ft. by 7, is rudely railed off to form a cage, in which the young woman is confined. It contains a miserable bed placed on the floor of damp earth, in which a hole is scooped out. She lay on the bed rolled up in the coverlet, but the bars of the cage were so broad, and the room so dark, that it was impossible to tell exactly in what condition she was as to clothing and cleanliness. The unhappy girl has passed several years in this state.

These two are also cases of lunatics under private care:—

A. C., aged 55: Kept by his brother, has been insane about 25 years, but for the last year or two has been allowed a room and liberty, having never been out of it. We found him sitting in bed in a state of nudity wrapped up in a sheet or blanket. The bed was very dirty, and covered with rags and filth. He had not been out of the room for a year.

D. T., aged 22, an idiot: Resides with his parents, who have two other imbecile children, at C—, in Caithness-shire. When visited he was sitting in the grate almost naked. He was very much emaciated, and his hand and legs were covered with a cutaneous eruption. His habits are very dirty, and he is frequently beaten, with a view of correcting them. His appetite is great, but it would appear is generally very imperfectly satisfied.

These are specimens of lunatics living under the care of individuals with whom they are placed, or to whom they belong. The Report contains many such melancholy pictures, more affecting to the beholders, probably, than to the insane themselves. They are, we believe, happily unconscious of either degradation or suffering, and their apparent misery rouses in others the sympathy which begets help and kindness. At times the calamity, when prolonged, wears out the patience of friends and relatives, and the sufferer is cast into more unhappy duries. For such cases the individuals, and not the public authorities, are to blame, except in allowing the insane to remain under the care of private persons, and not providing sufficient accommodation for them. The law of Scotland is singularly defective on this point, and makes no provision for even a fair proportion of the insane in public asylums. It does not provide such asylums, and accordingly none exist.

What are called public asylums, of which there are but seven, originate in private benevolence, but are charities, and placed under the supervision of the authorities. They receive both pauper and private patients, and generally treat them much better than they are or can be treated in the cottages of the peasantry. But in some of them, though the old system of coercion is no longer generally in force, there prevails a practice of shutting up patients, in total seclusion, in small cells with stone floors and darkened windows. They are allowed no other covering than blankets, and no other bedding than loose straw cast on the floor. Similar treatment drives the sane mad, and must increase insanity and its cure in Scotland.

In private establishments, though licensed and subject to supervision, the treatment is extremely bad. Amongst those who keep them for profit are a "victual-dealer," an "unsuccessful baker," "a gardener," and "a woman keeping a public-house." They are deficient in the more ordinary accommodation, even want tables, and the patients take their food sitting on their beds or squatting in the corners of the floors or the courts. Mattresses soaked and left unchanged for days are not uncommon. It seems as if the swine in a well-arranged English farm are far better taken care of, in respect to lodging and cleanliness, than the lunatic paupers in many of these establishments. The parishes care only how to get rid of them at the smallest cost. Two places, Lilybank, at Musselburgh, and Hill End, at Greenock, are especially pointed out by the Commissioners as shamefully conducted. The old system of neglect, restraint, and coercion is continued in some of these establishments in all its rigour. They take the patients to do for them in the cheapest manner; and chains, being cheaper than attendants, are preferred. Kindness seems unknown; and the history of these establishments is one long, dreary description of neglect, dirt, inefficient diet, straps, strait-jackets, and brutal coercion.

To leave painful details for general facts, we must state that the total number of the insane in Scotland is 7403, 3736 being males and 3667 females. 2782 are private patients, 4649 are paupers, and 39 are criminals. Of 3328 in asylums, 708 were considered curable, and 2620 incurable; and, of 277 in unlicensed private establishments, 17 were considered curable and 260 incurable, the different proportions being probably due to the fact that those in the incipient stages of the disease are sent in greater proportions to asylums than to the other establishments. Of the total 7403, 768 are considered curable, 4032 incurable, and 2603 congenital idiots. These are curious facts, but more for comparison hereafter than at present, or with other countries for which data are wanting.

OPENING OF THE CRUMLIN VIADUCT.—This magnificent structure (which was opened for traffic on the 25th of May) was formally opened on Monday, in the presence of many of the principal engineers in the country, and a vast number of spectators. The viaduct, by far the largest in the world, has been erected for the purpose of extending the Newport, Abergavenny, and Hereford line to Taff Vale, thus opening up the means of communication between the rich mineral districts of Monmouthshire and Glamorganshire. Its height is 200 feet, and beneath runs the Western Valley line of the Monmouthshire Railway and Canal Company. It is almost exclusively constructed of iron. When the first train passed over a shout from thousands of voices rent the air, and the sight was a most spirit-stirring one.

The range of temperature during the week was 36·2 degrees

The wind was blowing freshly on the morning of the 30th and on the days of June 1 and 2; and on the nights of May 28 and 31 it was blowing keenly from the N. and E. The horizon was very misty on the morning of the 28th. A few drops of rain fell on the evening of the 29th, but the quantity was too slight to be registered in the rain-gauge. At seven a.m. and ten a.m. of June 3 a little rain was falling; but the day and afternoon were fine and clear.

The day was much overcast during the latter part of May; but was brilliantly clear on the nights of May 31 and June 1.

The daily means are obtained from observations made at 6h. and 10h. a.m., and 2h., 6h., and 10h. p.m., on each day, except Sunday, when the first observation is omitted. The corrections for diurnal variation are taken from the tables of Mr. Glaisher. The "Dew-point" and "Relative Humidity" are calculated, from observations of the dry and wet bulb thermometers, by Dr. Apjohn's Formula and Dalton's Tables of the Tension of Vapour. The movement of the wind is given by a self-recording Robinson's Anemometer, the amount stated for each day being that registered from midnight to midnight.

THE "SUSQUEHANNA."—The United States' paddle-wheel steam-frigate Susquehanna, Captain Joshua Sands, has come to this country with several officers on board, to render assistance in laying down the great Atlantic telegraph cable. She has four tubular boilers fitted athwart-ships, with upright tubes, the water lying around them. These boilers are connected in a peculiar way by the chief engineer of the United States' Navy, and were made at Baltimore; this is the first ship, with the exception of the Merrimac, which has been fitted with them. Her average consumption of coals (of which she stows away 1400 tons) is about 36 tons for the 24 hours, which amount produces an average speed of 10 knots an hour under steam alone. Her cylinders are six feet in diameter, four feet stroke, receiving from 15lb. to 20lb. pressure of steam, 15lb. being the average; average revolutions, fifteen or sixteen.

THE UNITED STATES' STEAM CORVETTE "NIAGARA."

THE important event of the laying down of an electric cable between this country and America has led to the visit of this leviathan ship of war to our waters; and she, and the paddle-sloop Susquehanna, which will accompany her as consort, will to render any assistance that may require, are now both lying in the river off Gravesend. Since her arrival in the Thames she has been visited by thousands, anxious to inspect the largest ship afloat in the world; and the courtesy and attention shown by her officers to those who have boarded her are not the least satisfactory reminiscence connected with this magnificent vessel, and the interesting purpose for which she has arrived here.

The Niagara corvette was built by the celebrated George Steers, the designer of the renowned schooner America, and is in fact almost a gigantic reproduction of that famous craft that, a few years since, so wonderfully astonished the old school of yacht-builders at the Isle of Wight. Of her merits, as to whether her form is well adapted for a fighting-ship, it is not in our province to assume an opinion. The relative merits of her and our own style of fighting-ships is giving rise to much controversy among naval authorities at the present time, and we leave the subject in the hands of our more scientific contemporaries. One little incident connected with these two wonderful productions of sheer builder may be mentioned here—that, while the monster ngnship is riding so proudly off Tilbury Fort, in a shipbuilder's yard, almost within musket-shot of her pennant, lies, we deeply regret to say, completely destroyed with dry-rot, the beautiful pleasure-boat mentioned above that so enlightened our yachtsmen in the Solent.

The Niagara is one of twelve steam-frigates ordered by Congress to be built, by way of a counterbalance to the enormous increase of the English and French marine. In building her Mr. Steers had four conflicting purposes to reconcile—to make her a good gun-boat, good sea-boat, good sailer, and good steamer; the result is a kind of compromise—the fastest sailer in the world, one of the fastest steamers, a fine sea-boat, and a man-of-war. Her length over all is 376 feet, breadth extreme 75 feet 6 inches, depth of hold 32 feet 6 inches, and her burden 3200 tons, or nearly 2000 tons larger than the Himalaya. After she has laid the Atlantic submarine cable, the Niagara will be fully armed and equipped for war, with twelve Dahlgren guns, 11 inches diameter in the bore, and throwing a solid shot of the enormous weight of 370 lb. a distance of 7000 yards, or four miles. The shells for these guns will weigh 130 lb.; and the guns themselves, 14 tons, have been cast at the West Point Foundry, near New York.

While alongside, the spars seem heavy; yet, from the deck, compared with the vast bulk of the hull, they appear almost too light. Their extreme length from step to truck is mainmast, 243 feet; foremast, 219; and mizen, 189. The mainyard is 106 feet long, and the foreyard 94. Between the bulwarks whispering pipes are laid running from the quarter-deck to forecastle, and 4 of the officers' orders are thus transmitted with perfect certainty and speed.

In the engine-room the whole motive power is placed amidships, and occupies less space with regard to force employed than the engines of any ordinary vessel. The engine-room is about twenty-eight feet long by twenty-six wide, and nine staircases are so arranged as to make all parts of it easily accessible. The three engines, by Murphy and Co., of New York, direct acting, three feet stroke, with connecting rods between the cylinders and cranks. The cylinders are 72 inches in diameter (nearly the same size as those of the Great Eastern), and placed horizontally across the vessel, so that the motion of the piston is from side to side. The shaft upon which the whole force is brought to bear is 11½ feet long, 50 inches in circumference, and weighs nearly 50 tons. The propeller is of brass, with two fans, nearly 19 feet in diameter, and having a pitch of 24 feet. The condensers are all on the starboard side of the vessel, the condensers on the port. Each of the latter has within itself the air-pump and hot well. The air-pumps are double acting, and work direct from the main piston-rod, so also the force-pumps. A 3-inch bilge injection is attached to each condenser, and can be used at a moment's notice to free the ship from water. In addition to these there are two bilge pumps, connected by the crank shaft to the engine, and so placed on constant operation, so that at all times the hold is as dry as a chip. There are four boilers, on the vertical tubular principle. Each of them is 21 feet 6 inches long by 14 feet wide, and has a heating surface of no less than 17,500 feet, and a grate surface of 484 square feet. Working at a pressure of 20lb. gives a power of 2000 horses, and at that rate of the revolutions are only 45 per minute. During the voyage from New York the consumption of coal was, at some periods, as low as 12 tons per day, and it never rose above 56. The average for full power may be taken at 50 tons per diem, or very little more than the consumption of some steamers in the English navy which cannot do their 10 knots an hour. The stowage room of the Niagara is for 800 tons of coals, which will suffice for 16 days' steaming at full speed. The funnels are telescopic, and 32 feet from the deck. At present the crew is 514, exclusive of officers; but, when fully armed, even this large complement is to be increased to 750 men—the crew of a 90-gun ship.

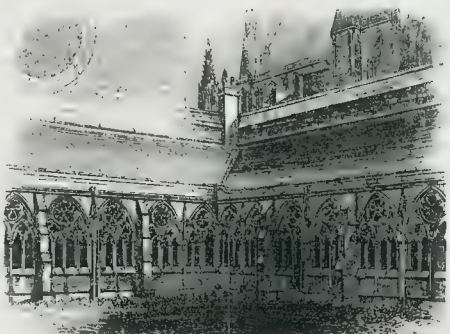
MEETING OF THE DIOCESAN ARCHITECTURAL ASSOCIATION, AT LINCOLN.

STOW CHURCH.

TORKSEY CASTLE.

THE meetings of this well-ordered Society were held last week, at Lincoln, with great success. The Association has, it is well known, had most beneficial effect upon the ecclesiastical architecture of Lincoln, while it has fostered the taste for archæology throughout the district. Of its practical results we find these apposite illustrations in the Lincolnshire Chronicle:—

If any doubt the improvement which has taken place even within our city and county, let them contrast the churches built a few years ago with the churches that have lately been erected. Let them compare the church of St Swithin with St. Michael's-on-the-Mount or St. Ann's chapel, or the ugly red-brick church at Sudbrooke with the church erected at Thorney, by Mr Neville, or the church and schools at Skellingthorpe. Everywhere the churchwarden Gothic of the past century is giving way before a more refined and educated taste, and for much of this improvement we are indebted to architectural and archæological societies. The early efforts of the Lincolnshire society were directed almost entirely to architectural matters; but at the present time, under its more extended sphere of usefulness as the Lincoln Diocesan Society, it has immensely enlarged its area of action and the number of its members, as well as the range of its studies. Besides promoting a knowledge of architecture, it now fosters historical and archæological researches; pays the utmost regard to painting as applicable to architecture; to carving in wood or stone; to the formation of ornamental works in iron and brass; to the beautiful art of photography; and to the newly-discovered process of anastatic painting, &c. The progress of the society has not been entirely uniform, nor without an occasional check; but, under the present liberal and comprehensive management, it has suddenly shot forth with most extraordinary vigour, both as to the character of its proceedings, the value of its proposed publications, and the number of noblemen and gentlemen who have joined its ranks between eighty and ninety fresh members having been added to its previously large body within the last six months. The number is steadily increasing, so that we may reasonably expect the scientific society, of which the counties of Lincoln and Nottingham may justly be proud, will soon vie with any kindred society in the kingdom.



PART OF THE CLOISTERS, LINCOLN CATHEDRAL.

On Monday several of the more active members of the Association arrived at Lincoln; and the local museum was arranged in the City Assembly Rooms, presenting a very interesting collection of rubbings from brasses, drawings, prints, and photographs of sites, principally in the county of Lincoln; besides a number of antiquarian relics illustrating the state of art as well as the social condition of the county in past ages; and proving how efficiently gatherings such as that at Lincoln contribute to the minute investigation and the complete appreciation of what may be termed the historia nos scripta of this important division of England, and the scene of so many great events in her civilisation and national greatness.

The proceedings commenced on Tuesday morning, when after choral service in the Cathedral, the Rev. G. A. Poole proceeded to the west end of the nave, and began by stating that the cathedral was built by Remigius, to whom William the Conqueror gave the bishopric of Dorchester, then the largest see. The Minster was built after the plan of Rouen Cathedral; but, looking at it now, he should sooner say that Rouen was built after Lincoln than Lincoln after Rouen. The Cathedral of Lincoln was the most interesting and most beautiful of all the cathedrals: it was more interesting and beautiful than that of York, which was generally placed before it; and Winchester, Ely, and Canterbury, only exceeded it in interest, whilst Durham did in site. Remigius completed the Cathedral during his life, and St. Hugh extended the building very considerably, both in width and length. St. Hugh also built the Chapter House now standing, having removed the one existing in his time on the northern side of the western transept. The retro-choir, which Mr. Poole considered the most elaborate portion of the building, was visited, and he pointed out the beautiful geometrical forms in the roof and on the walls. The defect in the building were numerous: one was that the pillars supporting the arches on the choir on the north side were one foot shorter than those on the south. He attributed this to carelessness. The peculiar pointing to the choir he looked upon merely as a whim. The different periods at which portions were added to the Cathedral were mentioned.

In the evening was held at the City Assembly Rooms a general meeting of the members of the Society, the Corporation, and the leading citizens, with their wives and families. The Lord Bishop of Lincoln presided. An address was then presented from the Corporation to the Secretary (the Rev. E. Trollope), who read a reply, in which he felicitously dwelt upon the architectural interest of the city:—

The Secretary then read extracts from the Duc d'Aumale, his Royal Highness regretting that he could not accept the Secretary's invitation to the meeting; "for," said the Duke, "I should have been charmed to have heard the account of the captivity of Jean le Bon, and to have visited Somerton Castle in such learned company. I have discovered amongst my archives the account of the household expenditure of King John during the greater part of his captivity, and this document has been printed, together with some collections which I have joined with it, in a volume of Miscellanies, published in 1855, by the Philobiblion Society of London." Of this work the Duke has presented to the Society a copy.

The Rev. E. Trollope then read a paper "On the Introduction of Christianity into Lincoln during the Saxon Period." We regret that we have not space for even an outline of this impressive paper.

The other paper read during the evening was the Rev. Mr. Poole's elaborate history of the Cathedral. For these contributions the thanks of the meeting were voted to the authors. The Lord Bishop was also thanked for his able presidency.

We have engraved an illustration of the lecture in the Cathedral—a portion of the Cloisters, which Mr. Poole considers to have been built not long after the Chapter-house.

From the Cathedral the visitors proceeded to inspect at Lincoln the Castle, the Bishop's Palace, the Jew's House, St. Mary-le-Wigford Church, St. Mary Crackpole, St. Mary Magdalen, St. Peter-at-Gowts Church, and the Sincil Dyke all objects of rare archæological or architectural interest.

THE SECOND DAY.

At nine o'clock in the morning the members of the Associated Societies and their friends started on the first day's excursion. They passed, as they left the city, the Malandry, or House for Lepers (founded by Remigius, the first Norman Bishop who accompanied the Conqueror), and the site of the Priory of St. Katherine, whence all the Bishops had to walk barefoot through the Cathedral on the morning of installation. The Kings, in their visit to Lincoln, used to stop at St. Katherine's. James I. was the last who lodged there. Near the toll-gate stood one of the crosses of Queen Eleanor, who died at Harby, in a house still moated round. The excursionists proceeded up Cross Cliffe-hill and to Waddington, the fine Norman tower of the church of which was allowed to fall in 1700. To this church the manor of Waddington of Wyes was attached. The manor once belonged to Harold, the last of the Saxon Kings. The church has been rebuilt since 1700, but has a Norman door, some Early English columns, and the remains of a Perpendicular rood-screen. Harmston Church, with its Norman tower, was next seen. Coleby lay next: here the Temple summer-house, the Norman and Early English church, and Coleby Hall, were the attractions.

BOOTHBY GRAFFOE. St. Andrew's Church is a small modern edifice. Its cure was once daily remunerated by John, the captive King of France. The manor belongs to Lady Dimsdale.

SOMERTON CASTLE.—After leaving Boothby, a ride of two miles brought the visitors to this castle, which is reputed to have been built about 1305, by Anthony Bec, Bishop of Durham, and was most likely seized by Edward I. Here Sir Saer de Rochford, a brave soldier in the French invasions of Edward III., engaged to keep safely John King of France, then captive in England, the same time with David Bruce, the Scotch King. The remuneration for this service, it was stipulated, should be 2s. a day. The ruins of the castle are now occupied as a farmhouse, but their extent warrants a supposition that the edifice was one worthy of feudal character—noble and extensive. An outer and an inner moat inclosed a rectangular area. The ramparts have long since disappeared, but there are remains of the circular towers at the four angles. The company having alighted from the conveyances, they took up their position on a mound, when they listened to an extremely interesting paper upon "Anthony Beke or Bec's Hall and the Castle," read by the Rev. E. Trollope. A ground plan of the castle was exhibited from the carriage from which the paper was read, showing the outer broad moat, the inner moat, &c. The two chimneys upon the only remaining tower, believed to be coeval with the castle, were considered to be very curious. A tower, supposed to have been erected near one of the drawbridges of the outer moat, has been recently discovered, and lies in course of rapid destruction for the purpose of repairing the adjacent roads

The excursionists returned through Boothby, and next visited Navenby, the chancel of the Early English church with its exquisitely-carved "Easter Sepulchre," the founder's tomb; the sedilia and piscina are truly beautiful. The privileges of holding fairs and markets, granted to Navenby by Edward the Confessor, in 1075, transferred to the Dean and Chapter (the now owners of the manor), for the leave given to Edward I. to deposit the head of Queen Eleanor under the altar of the Cathedral. Edward also granted from this manor ten marks annually for a chantry priest at Harby, where the Queen died. Navenby market-cross was erected in honour of her memory: it has been foolishly taken down. The excursionists next visited the church contains a beautiful alabaster monument of a Knight and his lady, supposed temp. Edward the Black Prince: the right leg of the Knight is now detached.

After halting to inspect Welbourn Church, in the Early, Decorated, and later styles, the visitors reached TEMPLE BRUER. "The Temple on the Heath," after crossing Ermine-street. There is, however, little to be seen. The Rev. Edw. Trollope read a very interesting treatise on the history of the Templars.

There was a difference of opinion upon the spot respecting the original form of the Temple; but it was conceded that the site of the Round Church was in a line where the chancel arch at one time existed. The Templars had several Preceptories in Lincolnshire, the chief being Temple Bruer; founded about 1185. Its possessions, given mainly by Lincolnshire families, amounted to above 10,000 acres, besides tenements in Blankney, Metheringham, Dunsby, Navenby, Scalby, and Leadenham. The church of Temple Bruer was circular, in imitation of the church of the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem, and at some distance is a tower still standing. The buildings were of vast extent. At Temple Bruer there were all the state officers of a baronial castle, and a large band of retainers were kept ever ready to the building of the superior. The place was always fortified and guarded. A license from King Edward I. to crenellate the towers were erected at the entrance-gate, which was also provided with a portcullis. The present owner of Temple Bruer has newly roofed the tower, and otherwise prevented further dilapidation.

In the evening the society dined in the Corn Exchange, the Bishop presiding, after which the company went to the City Assembly Rooms. The Rev. J. F. Dimock, Canon of Southwell Minster, read a paper on St. Hugh, Bishop of Lincoln, whose name is connected with the whole fabric of the Cathedral and Holy Sepulchre. E. Trollope read his paper on "The Captivity of John II., King of France, at Somerton Castle." The reverend authors of these papers were voted the thanks of the meeting.

THIRD DAY.

The excursionists left Lincoln at nine o'clock in the morning. The first village they reached was Burton, the seat of the family of Disney. The church has a Norman tower, together with North Carlton Church Here is a fine Elizabethan manor-house.

Till bridge-lane runs straight down to Littleborough. On the top of the hill, near Scampton, the late Dr. Illingworth discovered a fine large Roman villa, probably the summer residence of the Roman Governor of Lindum. It had some beautiful tesselated pavements.

Scrow was next reached. This is established to be the ancient Sidnacester, or Lindisse, and the seat of the early Bishops till the fourteenth century. The site of the city was moated round, and there is still a circular descent underground, supposed to have been used as a retreat in perilous times. The church, which is cruciform, is traditionally reputed to have been founded by Eadbald, one of the last Bishops of Sidnacester, about 1050, and it is called the "Mother of Lincoln Minster." The church is now in a sad state of dilapidation, with the exception of the chancel. The windows, doorways, and northern arcade are fine specimens of Norman architecture. There are also two rude Saxon doorways. The central tower stands upon four Gothic arches within Saxon ones the fresh arches being added when a larger was required. Above is the low Saxon lantern. The chancel is Norman. The vaulting of the roof has been restored as near to the old vaulting as could be ascertained from portions found in removing the earth. The stone coffin,

ROYAL SURREY GARDENS.—Mr. JULLIEN'S CONCERTS.—Grand Musical Congress to commence on MONDAY, FRIDAY, JUNE 12th, 1857, and continue for 60 days during the Handel Festival. The great number of artistes of European celebrity who have assembled in London to take part in, or be present at, the Handel Festival has encouraged M. Jullien to avail himself of so occasion so propitious, by repeating one of those grand Musical Fêtes, for which he has so long been celebrated, as last Paris in 1856, he Congrès Musical at the Crystal Palace. New York, in July, 1853, and the Grand Inauguration Festival at the Royal Surrey Gardens in July, 1856. It was on this last occasion that M. Jullien had the first idea of assembling that vast band of 2,000 performers, which has since been organised in London, Paris, and New York, and which, in the Festival Week, will be increased to 3,000 performers. The result produced by such a choice and numerous assemblage of Musical Artists was unparalleled, and Musical Amateurs, the Public, and the Press unanimously proclaimed that the Inauguration of the Great Musical Fêtes was to be held in London since the Handel Festival at Westminster Abbey in 1834. The Festival, which took place on the 25th of October, on the foundation of Haydn's oratorio, "The Creation." This will be succeeded by Mendelssohn's Oratorio, "Elijah, and by Haydn's "Season" in Four Parts, and a Monster Selection from the Oratorios of Handel, selected his finest composition. The revival of the last work has just taken place at Hanover, Berlin, and Paris, and is creating an unparalleled sensation among the musical population of those capitals; the performances on the occasion of the Handel Festival will be on a corresponding scale, the Courts, and the elite of the Nobility and Aristocracy, will be followed by a Musical Festival selected from "M'ne in Egitto" "Stabat Mater," and "Inuleame Tell," and a Vocal Festival with selections from "Norma," "Les Vepres Siciliennes," "I Lombardi, "Ernani," "Il Traviata," "Il Trovatore" After them will be given a Beethoven Night, a Mendelssohn Night, and a Mozart Night, on a scale even grander and more perfect than those classical evenings which M. Jullien has introduced each season for seventeen years, and which have always met with universal appreciation; and the Festival will conclude with a Grand Performance of Handel's Oratorio, "The Messiah" M. Jullien is not without hope that his musical friends in London and from the Provinces, the Continent, and the United States, who, for the last twenty-five years, have aided and supported his artistic career, will assemble during the Handel Festival to the Grand Performance in the Crystal Palace, give a few of their leisure hours during that season of festivity, and repair in the evening to the Hall of the Royal Surrey Gardens, a building erected expressly for music, capable of containing 12,000 persons, comfortably, and pronounced by far the best room in the United Kingdom for acoustic purposes. The Orchestra of M. Jullien, such as it is his late triumphant musical tour on the Continent was admitted to be the first in Europe, is of course to be heard at the Concerts, which will commence at Seven o'clock precisely to the minute, an engagement to perform elsewhere. Amongst the number, whose reputation is European, some may be cited without a fear that the unmentioned will complain, as Herr Joachim, Mr. Hughes, M. Lavigne, M. Collinet, Herr Stumpf, Herr Reichardt, &c. This Orchestra will be increased in number for the Musical Congress by several celebrities from the Academies and Conservatoires of Paris, Brussels, Antwerp, and Berlin. Engagements are pending with all the great Artistes present in London at this most extraordinary Musical epoch, and in these engagements, as in all others which M. Jullien has made for his Concerts, the rest and individual merit of the Artiste has been considered in preference to their fame and reputation. However, in the following list of first-rate Artistes who have already been secured, it will be seen that a great name has been considered no objection when united to a great talent:—Miss Catherine Hayes, Miss Dolby, who is accustomed to Morning Performance in the Crystal Palace, gives a few of their leisure hours during that season of festivity, and repair in the evening to the Hall of the Royal Sur ry Gardens, a building erected expressly for music, capable of containing 12,000 persons, comfortably, and pronounced by far the best room in the United Kingdom for acoustic purposes. The Orchestra of M. Jullien, such as it is his late triumphant musical tour on the Continent was admitted to be the first in Europe, is of course to be heard at the Concerts, which will commence at Seven o'clock precisely to the minute, an engagement to perform elsewhere. Amongst the number, whose reputation is European, some may be cited without a fear that the unmentioned will complain, as Herr Joachim, Mr. Hughes, M. Lavigne, M. However, in the following list of first-rate Artistes who have already been secured, it will be seen that a great name has been considered no objection when united to a great talent:—Miss Catherine Hayes, Miss Dolby, who is accustomed to English soprano, Miss Louisa Vinning, Madame Florentini Lear, first appearance (her last season); Madame Graziani, Miss Stabbach, Mdme. Weiss, the new celebrated Swedish singer Mdlle. Wagner, and Miss Dolby, and Miss Arabella Goddard; Mr. Sims Reeves, Herr Reichardt, Mr. G. Perren, Mr. Weiss, M. Gassier, &c.; also with Herr Ernst, Signor De Bassini, Signor Piatti, Signor Andreoli and Signor Sivori. The Choral Arrangements, under the direction of Mr. Land, on the grand scale, and inclusive of the Royal Surrey Choral Society—the freshness of whose voices and purity of intonation, as well as perfect ensemble attained in so short a period from its organisation, have been unanimously acknowledged Leaders—Mr. Willy of the Two Philharmonic Societies; Mr. Sainton (from the Imperial Academy, Paris); and Herr Kœnig. Conductors—M. Jullien (of the Royal Italian Opera and the Orchestral Union), Signor Bonetti (Conductor of the Royal Italian Opera, Paris) and M. Jullien. The names of other Artistes with whom engagements are pending will be advertised in the Programmes; but the Public is requested not to expect a multitude of names, as M. Jullien considers that a small number, equally good, is preferred to quantity Admission One Shilling. Private Boxes, Stalls, and Reserved Seats, to be secured at Jullien's, 214, Regent-street; Keith, Prowse and Co., Cheapside; and at the office of the Gardens. The Concert will commence each evening at Eight o'clock

MUSICAL UNION—EXTRA MATINEE for EURINSTEIN, the distinguished Composer and Pianist TUESDAY, JUNE 9, Willis's Rooms.—1 Quartet, B flat, Cœsar F. THE ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE, Incorporated A.D. 1720, by Charter of King George I., and confirmed by especial Act of Parliament.

Fire, Life, and Marine Assurances may be effected with this Corporation on advantageous terms.

Life Assurances are granted with, or without, participation in Profits; in the latter case at reduced rates of premium.

No sum not exceeding a 5,000 may be assured on the same Life.

The Investments of the Funds on British Policies has averaged 48 per cent upon the premiums paid, or very nearly 2 per cent per annum upon the sum assured.

The future Divisions of Profit will take place every Five Years

The Expenses of Management, being divided between the different branches, are spread over a larger amount of business than that carried on by any Proprietary Office. The charge upon each Policy is thereby so much reduced as to account for the magnitude of the Bonus which has been declared, and to afford a probability that a similar rate will be maintained at future divisions

The Corporation affords to the Assured a liberal participation in Profits, with exemption under Royal Charter from the liabilities of partnership—a rate of Bonus equal to the average returns of Mutual Societies with the guarantee, not afforded by them, of a large invested Capital Stock—the advantage of modern practice, with the security of the Old Establishment—those sources have been tested by the experience of nearly a Century and a half.

SPECIAL NOTICE

Persons in the receipt of Life Incomes are reminded that the reduction of the Income Tax enables them to make a considerable provision for their families, without any effort or self-denial to which they have but been accustomed to during the past two years

MAGNUS'S SLATE BILLIARD TABLES, with cushions that (having assimilated slate frames and solid slate legs) are suitable for exportation. Her Majesty has one in the drawing-room at Osborne, the Duke of Wellington has one at Strathfieldsaye, and they are patronised by noblemen in general, as well as by the most scientific players.

See Report by the Jurors at the Great Exhibition of 1851—"Of all the objects manufactured by this exhibitor the Billiard Table is perhaps the most important, as being decidedly superior to tables constructed of any other material. To this exhibitor the Jury have had no hesitation in awarding the Prize Medal, in acknowledgment of his admirable and useful contrivances and applications"

Although the tables are unanimously superior to all others, Mr. Magnus is now able to supply them for less than tables with mahogany frames. Pimlico Slate Works, 29 and 40, Upper Belgrave-place, Pimlico, S.W.

MAGNUS'S ENAMELLED SLATE CHIMNEYPIECES, Table Tops, Cabinet Stoves, Billiard and Bagatelle Tables, Chiffoniers, Baths, Washstand Tops, Alter Tables, Mural Tablets, Hanging Shelves, Columns, Wall Lindings, Plinths, Vases, Baby Fittings, &c., obtained the Medal of the Society of Arts, the Prize Medal of the Great Exhibition of 1851, and two First Class Medals at the Paris Exhibition of 1855. Much cheaper, handsomer, and more durable than Marble.—N.B. Caverns and Plain Slabs Work of all Descriptions. Pimlico Slate Works, 29 and 40, Upper Belgrave-place, Pimlico, S.W.

MAGNUS'S CABINET-FORMED STOVE, with double flue, and hot-air chambers. Decidedly the most novel, elegant, economic, and com cetable stove that has been introduced to the public. In the drawing-room it answers the purpose of a stove, a chiffonier, or, a console-table. It is composed almost entirely of enamelled slate and firestone. Can be had movable upon casters, and is suitable to every apartment, and to all styles of mansions, churches, &c.—Pimlico Slate Works, 29 and 40, Upper Belgrave-place, Pimlico, S.W.

VISIT OF THE GRAND DUKE CONSTANTINE TO HER MAJESTY AT OSBORNE.

HIS Imperial Highness the Grand Duke Constantine arrived at Osborne, on his visit to her Majesty, shortly before two o'clock on Saturday, last, attended by M. de Osbourieff, M. de Golovnine, M. de Haurowix, M. de Greig (Colonel A.D.C.), and Prince Ouchtomsky (Lieut. de Vaisseau A.D.C.).

The Grand Duke arrived last from Cherbourg in the Admiralty yacht Osborne, on board of which Captain J. H. Seymour, C.B., came at Portsmouth, and remained with his Imperial Highness.

The ships at Spithead, with masts lower dressed, were formed in position in the following order of line ahead, and received the Grand Duke with a Royal salute:—Agamemnon, 91 screw, Captain H. Eyres Cft; Colossus, 81, screw, Captain T. S. Thompson; Leander, 50, Captain J. W. Tarleton, C.B.; Mersey, 17 screw, Captain A. Farquhar; Archer, 11 screw, Captain L. Heath; Rook, 17 screw, Commander A. J. Curtis. Emperor is paddle; Captain C. Wise; Desolation, 6, paddle, Commander I. Marshall; Sealark, 12, Lieutenant Lowther; Rifle, 3, Lieutenant Nolan; Lizard, 3, paddle, Master Commander Hockley.

The Royal yacht Osborne, with Her Majesty on board, manned yards and fired a salute of twenty-one guns; the band on board striking up the Russian national anthem. The Osborne passed by Cowes Roads with the Grand Duke Constantine on the paddle box, where he seemed to be walking much between the spectacle and him.

On the approach of the Osborne to Osborne pier, her Majesty's ship Fairfield saluted the Russian flag and the Queen's barge from the Royal yacht went alongside to disembark his Imperial Highness who, on landing, was received on the pier by Prince Albert, accompanied by the Prince of Wales and Prince Alfred. Count Chreptowitch, the Russian Minister, was also at the pier to pay his respects to the Grand Duke. The Royal party and the suite immediately got into her Majesty's carriages, which were in waiting, and drove to the house, the Grand Duke, the Prince, the Prince of Wales, and Prince Alfred occupying the first carriage. The Queen received his Imperial Highness at the hall door, accompanied by the Princesses, the Duchess of Kent, and the Duke of Cambridge; and attended by the Ladies and Gentlemen in Waiting. The Earl of Clarendon was also present. The gentlemen of the suite were presented to her Majesty by the Grand Duke. A guard of honour of the 93rd Highlanders was formed on the lawn near the house. In the afternoon the Queen and Prince, accompanied by the Grand Duke, and the Duke of Cambridge, walked and drove in the grounds.

The dinner-time party in the evening included his Imperial Highness the Grand Duke Constantine; their Royal Highnesses the Duchess of Kent, the Princess Royal, and the Duke of Cambridge, Prince Lieven, the Russian Minister, and Countess Clreptowitch; the Earl of Clarendon, Admiral Palmerston, Lady A. Bruce, Captain J. H. Seymour, R.N., the Admiral, the Hon. Caroline Murray, Colonel Grey, and Prince Ouchtomsky in waiting to the Grand Duke; and Colonel Tyrwhitt. The band of the Royal Marines played a selection of musical entertainment.

The Grand Duke and suite re-embarked on board the Osborne about eleven on Saturday night, and at five o'clock on Monday morning she weighed and left, under a salute of twenty-one guns from the "R. Y. S." battery at Cowes. As she approached Spithead, with the Grand Duke's standard at the main, the Leander, pendant ship, fired a general Royal salute from the squadron at Spithead, all with mast heads dressed. By a quarter to six the Osborne was out of sight from Ports mouth and steaming away at full speed for Calais.

At the request of his Imperial Highness the yacht was steered as close as possible to the English coast the whole way up Channel. The duke presented Captain Seymour with an elegantly-chased gold snuff-box, and 100 napoleons to be distributed among the crew.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

HER MAJESTY inspected the gallant 93rd Highlanders at the Royal Clarence yard, Portsmouth, on Thursday.

HIS Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, as General Commanding-in-Chief held a levee at the Horse Guards on Wednesday, when a numerous circle of officers waited on his Royal Highness.

THE Right Hon. Sir Charles Wood, Bart., G.C.B., Vice-Admiral the Right Hon. Sir Maurice Frederick Fitzhardinge Berkeley, K.C.B., Rear-Admiral the Hon. Sir Richard Saunders Dundas, K.C.B., Rear-Admiral the Hon. Keith Stewart Arbuthnot Stuart Murray, and Thomas George Baring, Esq., have been appointed Lords of Her Majesty's Commissioners for executing the office of Lord High Admiral of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and the dominions, islands, and territories thereunto belonging.

THE VICTORIA CROSS.—It is understood the distribution of the Victoria Cross (the Order of Valour) will take place early in the ensuing month. Her Majesty will personally award the decoration to those gallant individuals entitled to the honour. The ceremony will take place on the parade ground of the Horse Guards, as was the case when the Crimean medals were distributed.

THE Lords of the Admiralty have decided on granting to sergeants of the Marine Corps the good-conduct pay, on an equal ratio with the sergeants of the Royal Artillery, the regulation to date from April 1, 1857.

THE Battalion of Royal Marines (Light Infantry) of the Chatham division was inspected on Wednesday by Major General Lord Rokeby. The troops went through various manœuvres. The light infantry skirmishing was very superior. A marine on duty at the barrack gate formed a square, when the Major General addressed the Colonel and officers, and, on observing that the inspection had given him the greatest satisfaction.

THE Ships Orwell and Palmerston have left Deptford to receive the 77th Regiment on board for convoy once to Sydney, New South Wales.

THE following ships have been chartered by the East India Company for the conveyance of troops to India, viz.:—For Calcutta, Roxburgh, 656 tons, July 1; Lowjee Family, 1,000 tons, July 8; Cressy, 999 tons, July 11; Octavia, 1055 tons, July 25. For Kurrachee:—Bombay, 1398 tons, July 21; Alnwick, 852 tons, July 21. The ships Palmerston and Barham are to be chartered to convey invalids from the Cape of Good Hope, the 97th Regiment from the Cape to Point Hope to Auckland, New Zealand, and return to Portsmouth with the 58th Regiment.

A GRAND REVIEW of all the troops comprising the Dublin garrison took place on Tuesday in the Park, to celebrate the birthday of her Majesty. Field officers on the head quarters staff, the Lancers, Rifle Brigade, and Artillery, were present. The cavalry manœuvres, some brilliant charges of cavalry were executed during the day. Both the Lancers presenting a very picturesque appearance. After the conclusion of the review the Right Honourable the Lord Lieutenant and his Aide-de-Camp with Lord Seaton the General in command of the field and his staff took up their position in front of the Bagot-hill when the various regiments marched by in the order of their bands playing in succession. The cavalry subsequently formed to the right of the Bagot-hill, and executed some charges past it, which concluded the review.

ON Saturday last took place in the barrack-square of the Royal Marine Barracks, Chatham, in presence of all the officers and men, the presentation of a silver medal, with a gratuity of £15, awarded by the Admiralty to Colour Sergeant R. Matthews, for long service and meritorious conduct. The medal was presented by Colonel F. A. Parker the Commandant.

A REPETITION of the experiments with Martin's shells took place in Woolwich Marshes on Saturday last, over the usual range of 400 and 500 yards. The shells fired with the ordinary amount of powder to a 68-lb cask, were fired at a hulkhead, as on the former occasion, the target which shells struck the object proved the desired effect of speedily igniting. Fourteen similar shells were thrown in succession, some of which passed completely through the hulkhead, four others fell wide of the mark, and the remainder proved to be as successful as the first. Some additional experiments were likewise fired, the object being to prove thoroughly of sundry plates of steel and iron the former inches were of cast and wrought iron and were fired over the usual range, 400 and 500 yards. From a new gounds gun erected on a newly-invented dwarf platform a shell was discharged, which went from the first shot which passed through the entire structure. Between twenty and thirty shots were fired with a similar result.

THE Terrattrance left Demerara on the 4th of May for Kingston, Jamaica with the 2nd West India Regiment.

MILITARY MESS EXPENDITURE.—His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief has issued an order for a rigid limitation of the charges for the dinners and for the exclusion from the mess table of such expensive wines as champagne. Two shillings per diem is to be the maximum price for each officer's dinner, and, in consideration of the hours of subalterns, the Prince Regent's allowance for wine, of which only a portion of the officers were accustomed to partake, is to be appropriated to the common use in reducing the actual expense of each officer to a sum. Thus each infantry subaltern will have 2s. 6d. per diem for the other necessaries of life.

EXHIBITION OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

[FOURTH NOTICE.]

AMONG the landscapes which we have not hitherto noticed, the works of Mr. Cooke, A.R.A., deserve perhaps the first consideration. His "Crab and Lobster Shore" (98) and "Bit of English Coast" (500) are views on the beach at Boncherch. The first is especially careful in its rendering of the rough shore. The listlessness of the fishermen, the reflected white heat of the chalk cliffs is also very truthful, but the chalk is, so to speak, cooked into cheesy. Now, we all know that a chalk cliff with the sun upon it, would tell stark and vivid against the purest lake of summer cloud; but as the one is not less so. To equal conscientiousness Mr. Cooke has added a terrible interest in his large picture. "Morning after a Heavy Gale—Weather Moderating" (442). The painful story some of our readers may remember. An Indiaman struck on the Goodwin Sands in a storm, and the crew and passengers all perished in attempting to escape in the boats; the captain, however would not desert his ship, and his heroism was rewarded in his being rescued by the life-boat just before the vessel foundered. The waterlogged hull, with the solitary figure looking over the quarter-rail the rude and floating light-vessel, the naked, ghastly ribs of the shattered boat, the tumbled, still tempestuous sky, and the remorseless lashing of the sea realise the terror of the scene with thrilling literal power while nothing can be finer than the heavy and pale patch of the life-boat, with its gallant crew straining, every man at his oar more than the equally-truthful breach of the pilot-boat beating up alee to the rescue through the blinding spray from her bows, the crew trying to catch, in the "din of elemental strife," some directions shouted through a speaking-trumpet from the light-vessel. All the paraphernalia of the pilot-boat are painted very scrupulously. A still more perfect piece of unostentatious painting is No. 535, "A Thunderclouds passing over the Dutch Coast —Tide on the Turn." The great swelling pile of cumulus angrily erecting itself is an admirable bit of meteorological observation.

"Autumn Morning, Hedge Brook and River Mead" (219), by Mr. Creswick, R.A., is very true to the effect intended—the pure early morning light, "bright effluence of bright essence increase," streaming from the horizon, but leaving all below the brow of the hill in a monotonous breadth of shadow till the detail is picked out by the direct rays. The whole does not appear so useful at first sight, but, upon examination and taking into consideration various exceptional conditions under which it is seen, it will be found remarkably true to nature.

"Where the pebbling flocks disturb" (467), by Mr. W. Linnell has most qualities which can be found in Landscape, with its beautiful colour, its rich boldly painted foreground, its rolling reach for distances, and the sense of atmosphere. "The Mountain Path" (487), by Mr. J. T. Linnell, is more than promising, as witness its luminous thin air and transparent shadows, and the magical azure veil drawn over the hoary range of hills.

We have already intimated incidentally Mr. Redgrave's charming landscapes. From Mr. Witherington, R.A., we have several cheerful views sunny and homely, but with demand to attention to particular truth. Mr. Herbert, R.A., gives us a beautifully bright little bit of the "Coast of France" (230), and Mr. F. Danby, A.R.A., presents us with another of its glowing yet dusky dreams, in this instance "The Court Palace, at Cordova of Alcazar" (245), as seen on "a ruddy morning," surmounting the impish dale material.

"Rydal, Westmoreland" (242), by Mr. J. M. Carrick, will excite general astonishment and unqualified admiration as we have. It is poor and washed out in colour, but in close observation of nature, in topographical accuracy, and extremely conscientious elaboration, it is perhaps unequalled by any work of the kind in the exhibition.

Another work of similar character, though far richer in colour, is the "Caernarvonshire Hills, from Anglesea" (508), by Mr. Oakes; but we forewarn our readers that if they are at all short-sighted an opera-glass will be indispensable to appreciate the wonderful foreground painting.

Next the floor in the rooms will be found a number of unassuming works in landscape, but many of them are of great excellence. The greater number are not, properly speaking, landscapes, but rather studies for landscapes, and they show plainly in their close imitation of nature, the influence of photography. By Mr. Antrum, for example, there is a true and pure landscape, and by A. Hunt, Esq., a large one at Evening (55). Its execution also is delightfully unlaboured, suiting the peacefulness of the hour and the beauty of the scene.

There are, as we have said, many more of these unpretending works of fully equal excellence with such, for instance, as the Swiss scenes by Mr. Moore, and the studies by Messrs. Hunt and Stanfield; but we must, from want of space, perforce pass them by, together with the noteworthy works of the following artists, viz.:—Anthony Hering, Boddington, A. W. Williams, Holmes, J. Danby, E. C. Beth, T. F. Marshall, Hicks, Mogford, Alfred Hunt, Leighton, Peel, Linton, per, J. Thompson, and V. Cole. Mr. Lance contributes one of his fine flower pieces, and Miss A. F. Mutrie the best group of flowers (No. 62) that first impressed the portraits in the present Exhibition was that they were, decidedly, less meritorious than usual; but we regret to find upon a careful examination that there is nothing but an improvement. Partly it is that this distinction so generally obtains between the moderns and the old masters—namely, that the first impression of the former is the most pleasing, whilst that of the latter is least so.

Mr. Knight, R.A., after a year's absence, appears in great strength, and assuredly the most perfect resemblance and certainly the best painted head is that of Sir Charles Eastlake, P.R.A., by this artist. To those who know the accomplished painter and scholar the President of the Royal Academy the likeness is startling and in addition a certain settled, somewhat pedantic air, is caught with the utmost felicity. There is also a slight, a very slight, red flush, but a still more indefinite expression of deprecation, or even of suffering; but this is so nicely lost in just that amount of geniality, and just that degree of pleasure in the whole which is worthy. Perhaps it would wear when entered in the room in which Lord Eastlake lives, and with which he is invested at the annual dinner or state private view of the Academy. The expression and attitude of eye are carried even into the hands. The whole remains an irresistible of the "easily seeming" sir Joshua Reynolds given in Goldsmith's charming sketch, particularly of the line

His manners were garish, company, and bland

The colouring is deep and rich, the rather peculiar complexion being set off by, and the scarlet and crimson robes nicely relieved against the dark green background. The contrast of the more positive green behind the more ruddy complexion of Mr. N. B. Ward (81), the inventor of the "Wardian" fernery, &c., is scarcely so pleasing, though the introduction of the African plants is, of course, very appropriate. The head is painted with great force. There is a certain deal of the falsity of earnest life in the grouping of the "Rev. G. T. Marker and Mrs. Marker" (496), and the revered gentleman has placed the Lady's forearm with much ease and dignity, but the colours, especially of the black robes and the background do not seem to harmonise well together, and is there not too great a perspective diminution of the gentleman's head? There are several other portraits by Mr. Knight, all distinguished for sterling qualities, such as we like expression, powerful modelling, and fine art.

About a good portrait there is so much individuality that one can always associate its being so, though you never knew the original. This is generally noticeable in the portraits of Sir Watson Gordon, R.A., as in those before us, and in that of Lord Elcho. It is faithful to every trait of character and every turn of thought. All the world, we all know, for example, the shrewd humorous and unaffected Scotch type so truthfully given in the portrait of "Miss Hutton (462), still we are quite confident that it is the perfect resemblance of an individual. This is no mean merit, for it has preserved many works to our time which, perhaps, even their eminence as works of art would not have saved from the garret and destruction. Every one is not a judge of painting; but we all understand nature, and like to hold silent communion, with an eloquent, unaffected portrait, when the reality has been long laid in the silent tomb with all those who held his or her remembrance dear. It is not, however, in the glaring distractions of an exhibition that we can best appreciate the higher qualities of portraiture. The works of Sir Watson Gordon are also often too quiet in colour, as in the picture before us, and, large surfaces of neutral browns and greys taking the place of the usual hackneyed pillar, curtain, and other accessories, we are at first sight too apt to pass them by as the least, undefeated transcripts of people of mark certainly, but treated merely in a matter-of-fact way. "The Right Hon. Sir George Clark" (430) is another illustration of our remarks. The sagacity in the eye and the pleasant perk in the attitude are very natural. "Lord Murray" (305), is especially admirable for its venerable, almost patriarchal, expression, and its fine deep tone. The portrait of "Grace Cowley" (47), the author of the "Footsteps of Man," is a strong resemblance, and has also a subject, but the want of colour, as seen in Sir Watson's headless portraits, as in No. 96, is a bad example for younger men. "General Sir J. Shaw" (272), also the full length with a Crimean background, looks as if he had never been in the trenches.

Mr. Grant is distinguished by his peculiar and characteristic grace, and his portraits of this year are generally less pure in colour, flat and the application indirect, than they have been recently. His ladies also are less reserved and cold. He has, besides, made a delightful innovation in the background of the portrait of "Mrs. Markham" (464). The lady is taking a country walk over the moors, the hem of her cloth habit and the upper part of her black dress, too, tucked up to show one or two inches of her stout morning petticoat, and the sporting gun in the hand. The whole is surrounded with a conventional landscape background; but the beauty of the face and the sharp intensity of expression soon absorb the whole attention, though the free suggestive discrimination of lace, muslin, felt, and other textures, might well claim notice and admiration. The hair is less rich in colour, but not lower than the average in bad judges, if not in those more conversant with truth. We mention this because there is, we think, very general but taste fostered, perhaps by Phrenology, in admiring a high bare forehead, at least in youth. As age advances we all know the hair recedes, and it may, therefore, be a mark of youth, and consequently of beauty, when it grows low. The "Marquis of Lansdowne" (57) we have in this case is, in addition, a full and grand one of which Sir George has taken advantage, and brightness in the eye is the result. The portrait of the "Marquis of Lansdowne" (57) is very fine and the eyes twinkle very sarcastically yet pleasantly over the shaggy, bushy eyebrows, but the painting is not so good. We find it to be one of the portrait of Sir James Graham," the ex-First Lord of the Admiralty, Polack (230) is almost as far superior as is possible, and is, indeed, one of the most manly portraits, and certainly the most earnest we have seen from Mr. Grant.

Mr. Adler (471), the Chief Rabbi of the Jewish Synagogue, by Mr. Hart, R.A., is very vigorous and bright in head and shade spirited in expression and argumentative in gesture. By the same learned professor of painting there is also an excellent picture which we have not mentioned with the works in class entitled "Sacred Song (103), and a view to children, one of the most beautiful lovers of early Italian art. Sir Francis Grant is also

Mr. Boxall, A.R.A., is as vapid and formless as ever. Of course, under everything is sacrificed in order to dwell upon a particular point of expression, and he is a bad painting lack coat character of all artists in the portrait of "Mr. D. Cox" (24), but I have a certain effect. But we insist that he artist to be inadequately logged and undermine is bad enough, but when there is such a total neglect of the education it is scarcely pardonable. The quiet thoughtfulness of "The Bishop of Chichester" (615), by this artist, is in no wise injured by its being more than usually distinct; and the sweet face in No. 116 is none the better for its musty muslin and the careless drawing of the cheek and chin.

Mr. George Richmond makes steady progress out. His portraits are very pure, fresh, and admirably drawn but they want force, which may be a consequence of his long practice of chalk drawing. The portrait of "Archdeacon Bernard" (11) is very quiet and benevolent and refined in execution almost to effeminacy. "Sir John Rennie" (626) is full of character, and very carefully modelled.

Mr. H. W. Phillips is successful in endless variety of his father. The portrait of "Sir John Bargrave" (10) is one of the best and very portraits in the collection. It is the likeness of a real veteran, cool, concentrated, and calculating—of one who can look on war as a game of chess. He has not the figure of Adonis, for he has been bent by the weight of responsibility and the sirocco of battle. And, being in the trenches, he is not dressed in a "spic and span" new suit of regimentals.

The space we have our disposal for this part of the exhibition renders it impossible to do more than attempt little better than a bare enumeration of some of the best of the remaining portraits. Mr. Horsley, A.R.A., has an excellent likeness of "Mr. Brunel, F.R.S.," but he, by Mr. Roberts, though a friend as we have in every other respect except the distracting flower in front in the background. Mr. Maclise's subject, "Sir Joseph Paxton," is striking, if his watch as it is intimate to the artist that the "Crystal Palace" but the impression is very pleasant nevertheless. No. 190 is an that good portrait by Mr. Jerome; but the head comes out a little too stark. Mr. Swinton does not improve, and the crowd of children in his portrait of the "Marchioness of Stafford" (12) is likewise beyond description; the dress tints also are more leaden that pearly. Mr. Buckner is, as usual chalky in his flesh tints, and in No. 246 there is the eternal broken green accessories. Mr. Buckner has, however, like the last-named artist, some perception of grace, still less what I peruse by avoiding the clumsy, forcible entering of a head, delineating the metacarpal bones. Mr. Desanges is pretty and commonplace as ever. He will not be the first artist of promise whom such an aim has seduced from natural portraiture into merely ornamental art. There is a good portrait by Mr. Pickersgill, R.A., of "Mr. Gibson," by Mr. Carpenter, A.R.A., of "Mr. Cockerell," and portrait of Mr. Wilson, M.P. (22), by Mr. F. Grant, and a portrait by Mr. J. R. Dicksee which deserves a better place. "The Syrian Sclerk" (29), by Mr. F. F. Leeds, we have not mentioned before, because it is evidently a portrait study, and a very favourable specimen of the artist. "Hero Hunting" (228), by Mr. Burgess, also a portrait, is saved in execution by the works of Mr. Sant, "The Lovers" (89), by Mr. Lundie, and "Intimacy" (56), by Mr. Smit, shows that we have spoken far too soon, but it is unsatisfactory on the whole. And finally, the portraits of Mr. Reilly; "The American Minister, Mr. Dallas" (15), by Mr. Lehmann (56) by Mr. Crang, No. 261, by Mr. Richardson, No. 641, by Mr. G. Landseer; and No. 465, by Mr. G. Green, all deserve attention.

We suppose courtesy has assigned their very conspicuous places to the portraits of her Majesty and Prince Albert, by Mr. Bonifibonne: but we are sure we do not want it particularly, we must say that the hard, very hard lines are in no way obnoxious, and the illustrious personages represented never look more gracious. We are not only not of English breed, but I am a French, but in graphs.

MONSTER DRUM.—Amongst other appliances which have been sought to augment the musical effects at the approaching great Handel Festival is a most stupendous drum, the largest of its size ever yet invented, that has been constructed. The committee of management have resolved for a drum-head of equal dimensions was an impossibility. Mr. Distin, the well-known musical instrument maker (and, we may observe, in connection with, and an experienced performer on various instruments in the orchestra). He took towards the most suitable expedient—a bass drum of large dimensions, and one which would possess that deep sonorous organ pipe tone which can only be obtained from an instrument of great capacity. The drum has been manufactured by Mr. Distin, and is now complete. It is exactly 4 yards and 1 inch in length, and 1 yard 2 inches in diameter. The drum-head is of calf-skin, and is stretched by means of 100 screws, by which a most delicate adjustment can be effected. The drum is elevated on a stand, and is so constructed that the performer can play it with ease, and can be distinctly heard at a great distance. The frame is said to contain nearly 300 pieces of mahogany adroitly joined in a manner best adapted to secure strength and freedom from warping. The instrument is as much under tuning control as a smaller drum. It more resembles a tamborine in its external form than an ordinary drum, having but one head. Mr. Distin, of Cranbourn-street. The great organ by Messrs. Grey and Davison is nearly complete.

THE salaries and expenses of the public departments for the present financial year amount to £1,509,000, being a decrease of upwards of £9000 on the sum expended for similar purposes last year.

"A little chink may let in much light."—OLD PROVERB.

ANTISEPTIC PROPERTIES IN THE SOIL OF CERTAIN BURIAL-PLACES.

A correspondent of "Memorabilia" (April 18, 1857) refers to the fact that human bodies "have been known to be preserved in St. Michan's vaults," Church street, Dublin; but regrets that he cannot give a satisfactory reply to the inquiry touching the cause of this antiseptic quality. The soil and walls of the crypt in question are a compound of argillaceous earth and carbonate of lime. This admixture exercises a chemically absorbent influence on all ordinary earthy and atmospheric moisture. Every one knows that moisture is, perhaps, the greatest aid to decomposition. Amid the rains of winter or the heats of summer the vaults of St. Michan, with the exception of one small chamber, are uniformly free from damp; and the consequence is the phenomenon referred to. The portion which appears damp is destitute of any animal remains but bones. In some of the dry compartments which are rarely opened the ornamental appendages of certain coffins shine as brilliantly as when originally deposited there—a circumstance which strikingly attests the uncommon aridity of the walls and soil. The floor is covered with dust as dry as that overlying a country road in summer. Beneath the foundation is a bed of siliceous sand.*

Some old people whom I have heard describe their visits (many a long year before) to the vaults of St. Michan refer particularly to the extraordinary state of preservation in which a nun, fully robed, might be viewed. When I visited this crypt, in the year 1847, I learned from Mr. Tweedie, the sexton, that the nun's remains, after having proved a source of considerable emolument to his predecessor, had been at last removed from public scrutiny. How little she, who shunned the gaze of men in life, imagined that thousands would inquisitively scan her features for half a century after her demise! Your correspondent is "not quite sure" whether four bodies, including those of the brothers Sheares (who were executed for treasonable practices in 1798), are still to be seen. The coffin containing their remains has been at length screwed down, and this really interesting object, though it may continue to excite, no longer satisfies public curiosity. A letter, published in Carrick's Dublin Morning Post, in 1822, describes the then appearance of the Sheares' remains:—"Henry's head lies by his brother's side. John's had not been completely detached by the blow of the executioner: one ligament of the neck still connects it with the body." The brothers Sheares were barristers by profession; and their history, as related by Sir Jonah Barrington and others, abounds in points of intense melancholy interest.

I do not agree with your correspondent in thinking that the "sympathising American patriots" in 1848 removed the remains of the Sheares for interment elsewhere, or caused their coffins to be nailed up. I remember having read sometime since, in Madden's "United Irishmen," that a warm political admirer of those gifted, but ill fated, young men contrived, when visiting the crypt with other friends, to sever, unobserved, the solitary ligament which connected John's head with the trunk, and to carry the relic in triumph home. The fate of John Sheares's head remained involved in mystery, until at length a qualm of conscience induced the possessor to restore it. Soon after this circumstance their remains, I believe, were no longer suffered to remain exposed.

As a further proof that to dryness of soil we may attribute non-decomposition of human bodies, I beg to append the following extract from some Continental letters of mine, which appeared in a weekly newspaper about five years ago. I have the facts from personal observation, and from the persons who showed the vault to visitors:—

About two miles from Bonn, on the summit of a verdant mountain, or the little chapel of the Kreutzberg (formerly attached to a monastery of Servites), which we visited on the evening of our arrival. A trap-door in the pavement of the church leads to the vaults which, from time immemorial, have been noted for possessing some of those antiseptic properties for which the ground about St. Michan's, in Dublin, is remarkable.

Here rest several adventurous pilgrims, who ventured, centuries ago, to this wood in search of sanctity, but had not fortune to return to their homes. The bodies of these pilgrims, as they appeared to us by the light of torches, are still to be seen in the vaults, in the extraordinary state of preservation in which they were found during the last century. The appearance of these bodies may be attributed partly to the dryness of the sandy soil which surrounds them. Here rested the lithe and grey cat-like skeleton of a pilgrim who, we were told, had died upwards of twenty months had only elapsed since their consignment to the ossuary; and the nails upon their bony fingers, and the scanty stock of stringy grey hair which encircles their craniums, lend a ghastly reality to the scene before us, which, when viewed by torchlight, has a very awful effect indeed. Many of the defunct brotherhood have their hands clasped in iron spirally upon their breasts as if in silent prayer; and, singular to say, the prominent, but hollow, veins upon the backs of their emaciated hands are plainly discernible, many years distant, notwithstanding that they seem to be the size and weight of ordinary thin men, their "specific gravity" is very trifling—so much so that by the aid of one finger I was easily enabled much to increase (to some English ladies present) to elevate the stiffened corpse of one obliquely in his coffin.

NOTES.

OLD MAY SONG.—As the month of May is just gone out, perhaps it may not be too late for a contribution to your notices of its old customs. Happening to be on a visit in the neighbourhood of Saffron Walden on the first day of the present month, I had an opportunity of taking down the words of an old May-day song, as it is still preserved in the village of Debden, where it is sung by the little girls of the village, who go about in parties on May-day morning carrying garlands from door to door. The following copy is made up from the recitative of three different juvenile parties, who differed somewhat in the way they sung it. They all seemed at fault in the third line of the second stanza the version of the first party being, There's nothing but a sprout, and the world's so dark, which is perfectly unintelligible; that of the second party was not much more clear: There's nothing but a sprout, that's well blotted out. The first stanza is to be repeated after each of the others by way of chorus:—

I, I have a rambling all this night,
And some part of this day.
And, now returning back again,
I brought you a garland gay

A garland gay I bring you here,
And at your door I stand;
'Tis nothing but a sprout, but 'tis well budded out,
The works of our Lord's hand.

Why don't you do as I have done
The very first day of May?
And from my parents I have come,
And could no longer stay

So dear, so dear as Christ lov'd us,
And for our sins was slain,
Christ bids us turn from wickedness,
And turn to the Lord again.

The garlands which the girls carry are sometimes large and handsome, and a doll is usually placed in the middle, dressed in white, according to certain traditional regulations. I have little doubt that this doll represents the Virgin Mary, and that it is a relic of the ages of Romanism. The first stanza is curiously varied by the following well known passage from Stubbs' "Anatomie of Abuses" (London, 1595):—"Against Maie . . . every parishe, towne, and village assemble themselves together, bothe men, women, and children, olde and yong, even all indifferently, and either goyng all together, or dividyng themselves into companies, they goe some to the woodes and groves, some to the hilles and mountaines, some to one place, some to another, where they spende all the night in pastymes, and in the morning they returne, bringing with them birds, bowes, and braunches of trees to deck their assemblies withall."—THOMAS WRIGHT.

QUAKERS AND TOBACCO.—In a late Number there is a statement that the average length of life among Friends, or Quakers, is greater than others, and attributing this principally to their abstinence from the use of tobacco. I believe many other causes besides the one here named contribute to the following astounding result, which is compiled from perfectly authentic sources:—In the year 1855-56 there died 287 members of the Society of Friends in Great Britain, of whom there died from birth to 5 years old, 37; from 5 to 10, 8; 10 to 15, 5; 15 to 20, 12; 20 to 30, 18; 30 to 40, 17; 40 to 50, 19; 50 to 60, 23; 60 to 70, 46; 70 to 80, 80; 80 to 90, 43; 90 to 100, 9. From this it will be seen that the greatest mortality among Quakers is between the ages of seventy and eighty, the next greatest between sixty and seventy, and the third greatest between eighty and ninety. Perhaps this may be at once accounts for the extraordinary success of the Friends Provident institution an assurance society originally confined exclusively to members of that persuasion, and even now to Friends and some few others who are intimately connected with the society.

QUAKERS AND TOBACCO.—Is it reasonable (assuming both to be proved) to attribute the longevity of Quakers to their abstinence from tobacco, and not to their general habits of temperance, cleanliness, and early rising, their easy circumstances, and withdrawal from the wearing amusements of fashionable life and from most other causes of undue excitement?—AN OLD SMOKER.

SALE OF SHAKSPEAREAN RARITIES.—Instead of diminishing, the value of scarce editions of Shakspeare appears every month to rise higher. At the sale of a part of Mr. Halliwell's collection the other day, at Messrs. Sotheby and Wilkinson's, the prices realised in some instances for a single play were astounding:—

A copy of the first edition of the "Second Part of Henrie the Fourth, continuing to his Death, and Coronation of Henrie the Fift, with the humours of Sir John Falstaffe, and swaggering Pistoll, 4to, Printed by V. S. for Andrew Wise, 1600," fetched £160.

A copy of the second edition of "The Historie of Henrie the Fourth; with the Battel at Shrewsbury, between the King and Lord Henry, surnamed Henrie Hotspur of the North. With the humourous conceits of Sir John Falstaffe, 4to, London, Printed by P. S., for Andrew Wise, 1599," brought £76.

A first edition of "Much Ado about Nothing." Printed by V. S., for Andrew Wise and William Aspley, 1600. £65.

"The Tragedie of Richarde Duke of Yorke, and the Death of good King Henrie the Sixt, with the whole contention between the twe houses, Lancaster and Yorke, as it was sundry times acted by the Right Hon. the Earl of Pembroke his Servantes. Printed at London by W. W. for Thomas Millington, and are to be sold at his shoppe under St. Peters Church, in Cornewall, 1600." £63

"The Tragedie of King Richarde the Seconde, as it hath been publikely acted by the Right Honourable the Lord Chamberlaine his Servantes, by William Shakespeare," Printed by W. W. for Mathew Law, 1608, £30 10s

"The Life and Death of King Lear," £20 10s

"The First and Second Part of the trouble some Raigne of John King of England, 1608," £17 10s. [This play is not Shakespeare's, but the mere fact of its being the work on which he founded his King John is sufficient to render a copy worth five hundred times its original cost!]

PRINTERS' ORTHOGRAPHY.—Another example of printers' spelling is the constant substitution of mesgre for mesger;—e. g., mesgre statement, instead of meager statement. Meager is evidently from the German mager. Mesgre day is correct, mesgre in this sense being an adoption from the French. J. G.

QUERIES.

THE CARMAN'S WHISTLE.—I find this given as the name o. the tune to an old ballad in my possession. Can you tell me the probable age of the tune, and where I am likely to find it?—J. B. S. [This ancient and pleasing tune is in Queen Elizabeth's and Lady Neville's Virginal books, so that it must be nearly three hundred years of age. It has been reprinted by Mr. W. Chappell, in his valuable repertory of merrie England's songs, ballads, and dances, called "Popular Music of the Olden Time," accompanied by an entertaining account of the carmen of shakspeare's day:—"The carmen of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries appear to have been famous for their musical abilities; but especially for whistling their tunes. Falstaff's description of Justice Shallow is, that 'he came ever in the rearward of the fashion,' and 'sung the tunes he heard the carmen whistle, and sware they were his fancies, or his good-nights' In Ben Jonson's 'Bartholomew Fair,' Waspe says, 'I dare not let him walk alone, for fear of learning vile tunes, which he will sung at supper and in the sermon time. If he can but a carman's whistle, I must have him not talk to keep him off on him, he will whistle him all his tunes over at night, in his sleep.' In the tract called 'The World runnes on Wheeles,' by Taylor, the water-poet, he says, 'If the carman's horse be melancholy or dull with hard and heavy pulling, then will he, like a kind piper, whistle him a fit of mirth to any tune, from whove Eela to belowe Gammoth.' Burton, in his 'Anatomy of Melancholy, says, 'A carman's whistle, or a boy singing some ballad carly in the street, may interrupt him almost in the midst of a sentence, and put

TOLL REFORM.

STATEMENT OF THE TOLL REFORM COMMITTEE, TRANSMITTED TO LORD PALMERSTON, M.P., FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY, ETC., ETC.

THIS Committee seeks an abolition of all toll gates and bars within a radius of six miles from Charing-cross, particularly on those roads north of the Thames which are now out of debt.

In 1855 the Dublin toll-gates were abolished by Act of Parliament, although the roads were then in debt.

In 1825 the question of the removal of the gates in the metropolitan streets north of the Thames was considered by Parliament. The following is an extract from the Committee's Report (1825):—

"The very small extent of the trusts, their particular situations, and the necessity of placing the toll-gates of each separate trust within its own little jurisdiction, have had the effect of fixing the toll-gates round London in situations the most inconvenient and vexatious to travellers—an inconvenience which has augmented with the great increase of the suburbs of London, whose intercourse and commerce within the limits of Middlesex has become as upon the streets of provincial towns, hence the frequent payments, stoppages and vexatious delays have become very serious grievances, which still continue to increase, to the great diminution of the value of property.

An Act was passed (7 Geo. IV., cap. 142) to carry out the recommendations of this report. Thus Parliament, before the passing of the Reform Bill, intended to apply a remedy for this nuisance in the metropolitan streets (north), but after a lapse of thirty years we find, on a re-investigation, that there are now under this commission—

1st. Sixteen tariffs of tolls and sixteen districts. Two horses pay in one district (city road) a toll of twopence, in the ninth district, fourpence; but in others sixpence.

2nd. In 1830 it had seventy-one gates and bars, and in 1856 they were increased to 117, and, the mileage being 123 miles, there is an obstruction to nearly each mile.

3rd.—Within four miles of Charing-cross the gates and bars are eighty-seven, being sixteen more than in the whole trust in 1830.

The city of London, where there are no toll-gates, is represented in the Commission by its four M.Ps. Westminster, with one toll-gate, is represented by its two M.Ps. The Tower Hamlets, where there are many gates, is not represented by its M.Ps.; and the largest district (the 9th), covering nearly the whole of the two boroughs of Marylebone and Finsbury, is not represented by its M.Ps.

The Commission has now the control of 123 miles of road, of which there are 112 miles "tolled" or subjected to the nuisance of turnpikes, but 11 miles are 'toll free.' The repairs of the 112 miles cost about £38,000, or about £340 per mile; but the repairs of the 11 miles cost about £15,000, or £1400 per mile. The 11 miles untolled are situate in the heavy-traffic districts, such as Knightsbridge, St. Margaret's, Westminster, Paddington, Marylebone, &c., but the 112 miles are situate in such places as Kentish-town, Holloway, Hackney, Kingsland, Stamford-hill, &c. Thus the suburban districts, after paying for their own suburban roads at the rate of £340 per mile, are taxed for the repair of roads, at the rate of £1400 per mile, in the crowded thoroughfares near Buckingham and Pimlico—a double injustice.

The "City tolls," collected within the City, have been abolished by the Corporation of London; but the City-road toll, just outside Finsbury-square, is continued by the Commissioners appointed to remove the (north) metropolitan gates.

The Islington gate, also at a mile and a quarter from the General Post-office, is continued by the same Commissioners.

The gates at Notting-hill and at Kensington are in two separate districts; the inhabitants cannot pass within their own parish without paying two tolls, and on the parallel roads there are other gates within a mile, and all these gates are continued by the Commission. There are many other instances of equal nuisance, such as the numerous gates and bars at Kilburn, Hackney-road, and other places.

The operation of the system of toll-gates is in every way most injurious particularly in the depreciation of property outside the toll-gates. The contrast between the value of houses within the bars, as compared with those outside, is obvious, and entails serious loss.

Toll-gates have the injurious effect of causing the erection of stables, cowhouses, cattle-sheds, and slaughter-houses, within the gates, to save the expense of tolls, thus causing great injury to the health of the inhabitants inside the gates.

One of the greatest objections to the system of turnpikes is, that it is a wasteful and offensive mode of collecting a tax, entailing a loss or deduction on the gross receipts, difficult to estimate, but of large amount, as the number of men and boys employed is great, and the profits of the contractors or farmers of the tax necessarily very considerable.

It is also an impost pressing heavily and unequally on those whose callings require them to use horses and carts, such as the dealers in coals, timber, and provisions.

The toll-gates also act most prejudicially to residents beyond the bars, as they discourage public conveyances travelling beyond the turnpikes, and thus, while impeding the development of the omnibus and cab trade, depriving the neighbourhoods outside of the gates of the advantages which those dwelling within them now enjoy.

Committees of the House of Commons have reported against the turnpike and ticket system in England, as Commissions have done in Ireland; and Government has begun a good work for Ireland in removing the Dublin gates.

This Committee, therefore, pray her Majesty's Government to introduce a measure for an early removal of the gates within the six-mile radius north of the Thames, and now under the control of the Metropolis Roads Commissioners; and as to the other roads within the same radius and upon which there are debts due, the Committee respectfully ask for a Commission of Inquiry—not as to the admitted and settled question whether the removal of all metropolitan bars would be an advantage, but to report on and suggest the best mode of providing a substitute in lieu of toll-gates, and the payment of the bonded debt.

HERBERT INGRAM, Chairman.

Toll Reform Committee, Office, 19, Strand, London, May, 1857.

The deputation which waited on Lord Palmerston on Wednesday, the 20th of May, 1857, consisted of the Right Hon. Lord Robert Grosvenor M.P., T. S. Duncombe, Esq., M.P., Herbert Ingram, Esq., M.P.; C. S. Butler, Esq., M.P.; E. W. Watkin, Esq., M.P., Charles Mackay, Esq., LL.D., Matthew Forster, Esq.; P. H. Le Breton, Esq., Professor Spencer, Mark Lemon, Esq., J. R. D. Tyssen, Esq., Thos. Slater, Esq., A. Lines, Esq., John Dangerfield, Esq.; R. Margetson, Esq., J. W. Turner, Esq.; Francis Toulmin, Esq.; Mr. J. E. Bousfield, Hon. Secretary; and Messrs. Lugg (Bermondsey) and Geo. Harding and A. Knox (Camberwell).

In the Map engraved upon the preceding pages, the dotted lines and initial letters show the Postal Districts, and the black spots denote the situation of the toll bars: in addition, there are upwards of 100 side-bars, within a radius of six miles of Charing-cross, which are not marked

"BLINK BONNY," THE WINNER OF THE DERBY AND OAKS.

"BLINK BONNY," THE WINNER OF THE DERBY AND OAKS.

BLINK BONNY is a yellow bay mare, inclining in parts to a dull tint, standing fifteen hands two-and-a-half inches high. Her head is lean, blood like, and tapering towards the nose, with nostrils, eyes, and ears rather wide apart. The white blaze in her face reminds one of West Australians, she has also a white fetlock joint. Her back is very good, clean towards the loin, and rather long; very great depth of shoulder and girth, particularly. Although your knees, comprising some of her best points, were not dribs, nor contracted, rising on the rump and drooping towards the tail, which was dock-scratch and carried close to her, it gives a mincing appearance. Blink Bonny has good thighs, hocks, arms, and knees; but is not a very lengthy animal.

PRESENTATION OF PLATE.—On Wednesday week a dinner took place at Fendall's Hotel, Westminster, at which a testimonial, consisting of an elegant silver centre-piece, was presented to William Thorpe, Esq., solicitor, of Thorpe, Yorkshire, by his clients and private friends. George Dodson, Esq., M.P., presided, supported in the duties of vice-president by Isaac Doubleday, Esq., of Ecclesall, Sheffield. About forty gentlemen sat down to the dinner.

At the conclusion of the first course, the chairman, in proposing the health of the guest of the evening, said that he had been requested to perform a very pleasant duty, which was to present to Mr. Thorpe, Esq., solicitor, Thorpe, at a dinner given to him, at Fendall's Hotel, London, by his clients and friends, as a token of their warm esteem of his worth and virtue, a piece of plate as a public testimonial of acknowledgment of the valuable advice and aid rendered by him in his profession for many years, and particularly in the successful termination of the railway cases affecting their interests. (27 May, 1857.)

AUSTRALIAN TELEGRAPH.—A Select Committee, appointed by the Legislative Council of New South Wales to inquire into the practicability of establishing a telegraphic communication between that colony and England, has made its report. In the evidence it appears that the best way would be to connect Sydney and Melbourne by way of Port Essington, Singapore, Calcutta, Bombay, and the Red Sea. There would be no submarine cable between England and the Indian Archipelago, except a short one between Java and the Peninsula. The cost of constructing a telegraph between Sydney and Port Essington—a distance of 1800 miles—is estimated at £350,000; and the annual cost, including interest on the outlay, is estimated at £56,000 per annum.

NEW ZEALAND FLAX.—From experiments which have been made recently it has been clearly established that the New Zealand flax, when properly prepared, is equal in strength to the best qualities of Russian or Italian hemp, and would successfully compete in the manufacture of cordage with that material. At some trials made in one of her Majesty's dockyards, by order of the Board of Admiralty, it was found that cordage made from the New Zealand flax bore a much greater strain than some of a similar size made from the hemp usually employed. In this case, as in the finer descriptions of manufacture, the great difficulty to be overcome is the removal, at a moderate cost, of the large quantity of resinous matter, which serves to increase the bulk which it adds nothing to the strength of the rope.

THE PRESIDENCY OF MADRAS.—Papers relating to the revised survey and assessment of the Madras Presidency and on the Godavery and Kistna Annicuts were published last Saturday. They include minutes of Lord Harris on the proposed survey and assessment, dated the 26th of October, 1854, and the 12th of May, 1855, and two letters from the Court of Directors to the Government of Fort St. George, dated the 11th of December, 1855, and the 2nd of July, 1856. The Directors consider that the urgent necessity for a survey, with a view to the reassessment of the land revenue in the greater portion of the districts under the Madras Presidency, is established beyond all doubt; and they proceed to review the proposals of Lord Harris and to state their approval or disapproval thereof. They express their entire satisfaction at the liberal and enlightened spirit in which this important subject has been discussed, and at the clear and candid manner in which the suggestions and recommendations of Lord Harris have been placed before them. The second letter of the directors refers to the Kistna and Godavery Annicuts.

WONDERFUL DATE-PALM TREE.—A place about twenty miles from Surat has been visited by immense numbers of people of all classes from the surrounding country for the purpose of beholding the prodigious date-palm tree. This tree is said to possess the strange property of rising from and falling to the ground along with the rising and setting sun, something in the same way as the sunflower rises and droops in Europe. The tree is supposed by the natives to be possessed by the spirit of a Mussulman peer, who, it is stated, regards with favourable eye those making offerings, money being preferred. One man, in a fit of valour, having brought proper to dedicate spirit, on his return home was seized with a severe vomiting; but, as the same result immediately follows large doses of arrack, it remains in some doubt what spirit he defied.

THE GIPSIES.—The Stamford Mercury has the following:—"At last even the gipsies are melting into civilisation, the green and gorse-covered roadside spots where they used to encamp in security being inclosed and thrown to the adjacent fields, and being hunted out of the by-lanes they have been compelled to make an effort. Several families have settled down in dwellings at Nettleham, and the men and women go out to work for the farmers, and make good labourers. At first the villagers did not take to their new neighbours very willingly, but by degrees distaste died away, and most seem disposed to give the wandering tribes a fair chance of losing their past identity in becoming mixed with the settled and industrious population."

THE SILK CROPS IN EUROPE.—After making allowance for some discrepancies the following appears to be the real state of affairs:—The accounts from Lyons, Spain, and Lombardy are decidedly unfavourable. In the latter country a deficiency similar to that of last year is apprehended. In Sicily and Calabria, on the other hand, the prospects are described as much more hopeful. Upon the whole, present indications render it probable that silk will maintain a high price, and that the flow of silver to China will consequently continue.

FATAL RAILWAY ACCIDENT IN FRANCE.—On Thursday week the express-train to Paris, in consequence of the fracture of a wheel, ran off the rails near the Mussey station, and the deputy superintendent at Bar le Duc went to the spot with a pilot-engine and a waggon, to render assistance, having orders that no train should start from Bar le Duc until the line was clear. These orders, however, were misunderstood, and the superintendent himself, arriving at the station immediately afterwards, started with the goods train, in ignorance of the arrangements made by his subordinate officer. In the meantime a portion of the express train, which had broken down was being taken back to Bar le Duc by the sous chef with the pilot-engine, so that it met the goods train, and there was a terrible collision. Two men were killed, and a dozen other persons were more or less injured.

COMMON LODGING HOUSES.—The report on the operations of, and proceedings under, the Common Lodging-houses Act, within the Metropolitan Police District has just been published, and its pages abound with evidence of the vast amount of improvement, sanitary and moral, which has been effected by its instrumentality. The Act for the well-ordering of common lodging houses has now been in operation above the year 1851, and has been attended by most beneficial results. Before this enactment the miseries existing in the lodging houses of the poor were beyond description. Crowded and filthy, without water or ventilation, without the least regard to cleanliness or decency, they were nestlings of disease, misery, and crime. Under the operation of the Act the evils attending such houses have been in a great degree removed or abated. They are now much improved, and daily improving, the keepers are of a better class; and, without increase of payment, the accommodation provided for the poor is in all respects of a higher standard.

"Prince Napoleon," says a Paris letter in the Nord of Brussels "will visit Manchester about the end of June."

DORNOCH, the only prison in the whole county of Sutherland having a population of nearly 26,000 inhabitants, is without a prisoner

DRAWINGROOM MISERIES.

PARLIAMENT is in a state of stagnation. Palmerston and Disraeli fold their arms in dignified expectation. The war in China languishes: Commissioner Yeh and Admiral Seymour, in the still waters of Canton, are as calmly observant of each other as our Parliamentary chiefs in their quiet anchorage of St. Stephen's. Europe is at peace. There is nothing stirring in America. No question, foreign or domestic, engrosses attention. Were it not for muttering and a rumbling in Asia, expressive of the discontent of our Sepoy regiments, and the certainty that, sooner or later, the hurricane of war will burst over the viceroyalty of Quan-tung, we might imagine that the beatific visions of Richard Cobden and John Bright had been partially realised; that the reign of peace and brotherhood had commenced; and that men had nothing to do but to turn their swords into ploughshares, to buy and to sell, to grow fat and rich, and to make Richard Cobden Czar of Muscovy, or President of the United States of America.

How long these halcyon days are to last who shall tell? And from what quarter the storm that is to disturb them shall arise who is far-sighted enough to predict? Will Mr. Disraeli be the Boreas?—or will it be Commissioner Yeh?—or the Emperor Napoleon III.?—or the Grand Duke Constantine?—or the Pope's Nuncio in Belgium? Without pretending to look into the future, or to calculate the approach of the storm, let us be thankful for the breathing time which is allowed us, and leave foreign and domestic politics to the stagnation into which they have subsided. We may be quite certain that the wind will blow in due time; that the British Parliament will not always be so quiescent or so acquiescent as it is to-day; that the Generals and Admirals of England and the Mandarins of China will settle their differences either by negotiation or by the sword; that the French will not always be resigned to the loss of their liberty, although M. Granier de Cassagnac may say in earnest what Beranger said in jest—that Italy and Germany will not always submit to the swords or their oppressors; and that the reign of peace is yet far distant.

Fi de la Liberté,
A bas la Liberté;

But in this time of general quietude, when no cry of distress or anger comes from the masses of the people, Society is startled by a wail of anguish from the serene circles of the upper aristocracy. There are miseries even in the sunny altitudes of high fashion; and a moan betraying a state of undeserved suffering has been wrung from the hearts of Peeresses with which we are certain all classes will sympathise. The British people take a pride in the Court of Queen Victoria, and are glad to see that the rank, the beauty, and the fashion of the country make it a point of duty as well as of pleasure to pay their personal respects to her Majesty at Levees and Drawingrooms, and every allowable opportunity. The Court is as much an institution amongst us as the Church, the Army, the Legislature, or the Press. Its functions are to elevate the tone of public morality and to cultivate the refinements of life, so as to give an example to all beneath it which shall tend to soften and adorn the intercourse of society. In the first respect the Court of our exemplary Sovereign may stand in favourable contrast with every Court in the world; and has never been excelled, or even equalled, by the Court of any pre-existing Sovereign of these realms. In the latter respect, however—in consequence, partly, of its own popularity, but in a still greater degree of the obstinacy or stupidity of the officials who are specially charged with the household duties of the Palace—the Queen's Court, on days of public reception, would do discredit to a race-course or a fair. That delicate ladies should have to wait for hours, on these occasions, before they can procure admission to the presence of their Sovereign, is perhaps an infliction not to be avoided, unless her Majesty, with the good sense and kind feeling for which she is noted, should hold Drawingrooms a little more frequently; but that during these hours the female aristocracy, arrayed in their most gorgeous trappings—bedizened, bejewelled, beflounced, and befeathered—should be crammed into inconvenient rooms; stuck into "pens" as if they were sheep at the new Cattle Market, only with much less space to turn in—and that they should be crushed, and squeezed, and jostled, and suffocated for the want of a little common sense on the part of those who have the management of the internal arrangements of the Palace, is too bad. That two thousand ladies and gentlemen should in one day desire to pay their respects to the Queen is not extraordinary; but it is both extraordinary and disgraceful that they cannot be allowed to do so without being subjected to the most painful annoyances; and that they should commonly arrive in the presence of the Queen with flushed faces, exasperated tempers, and torn finery; and all because the rooms in St. James's Palace are not well suited for the admission of such a crowd; or because, being suitable in themselves, the Lord Chamberlain, or those who are supposed to do his duty, are ignorant of the proper mode of turning them to advantage, or of making such arrangements as an Inspector of Police and half-a-dozen constables of ordinary intelligence would have no difficulty either in planning or in executing. If the aristocracy, and those whose official position renders graceful, if not necessary, their public appearance on stated occasions before the Sovereign, should decline to perform the duty until proper arrangements were made for their comfort and convenience, or if Court ceremonies, for the same reason, were to be left to gentlemen only, whose strength and courage might fit them for the unseemly struggles which are the present concomitants of the scene;—and a lady should be as rare a visitor at Court as a Mandarin or a Hippopotamus, the grievance, instead of being visible only to the Court officials, who seem to care nothing about it, would become palpable to her Majesty herself. In such case the remedy would not long be delayed, and a lady—the highest in the land—sympathising with ladies of a rank only inferior to her own, would take the matter in hand in spite of the obstruction of Polonius and his deputies. If publicity be not effective, and if all ordinary means fail in awakening the proper officials to the evil and to the remedy, strength, courage, and manliness will perhaps crowd to Court as before; but the mothers of the aristocracy will forego the exhausting struggle, on their own behalf and that of their daughters; and the youth, the beauty, and the feminine grace of the upper classes will reluctantly disappear from a scene which they are so well fitted to adorn.

If it be a question of expense, and not of mere arrangement, which stands in the way of the improvement of St. James's Palace, there will be no great difficulty to be overcome. Parliament is never niggardly when the comfort of the Sovereign, or the amenities of her Palace, are concerned. If it were, we should suggest a subscription among the aristocracy to provide the funds, which could not well exceed a thousand pounds. To say nothing of the personal comfort of their wives or daughters, the husbands or fathers of these ladies would rather contribute, say five or ten guineas each, for the improvement of the ante-rooms and the substitution of a good policeman for the Lord Chamberlain, than have dresses worth fifty or sixty guineas torn from the backs of those dear to them in the exasperating struggles of a fevered and impatient crowd. But, of course, such an appeal is unnecessary. It is not money that is wanted, but a little common sense and decent arrangement; and we shall be glad if these few remarks shall prove conducive in stirring up the one, or providing the other.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

The elections continue to occupy the French papers, to the almost total exclusion of every other topic. Judging from the accounts received from the departments, there can be little doubt that the spirit of the country is favourable to the Government.

The following is the latest list of the Opposition candidates for Paris, and for which the electors will be asked to vote: First electoral district—M. Lebouïcye, member of the Academy, and one of the editors of the Journal des Débats; second—M. Bethmont, former Minister under the Republic; third General Cavaignac; fourth M. Emile Ollivier, Advocate; fifth M. Carnot, Minister under the Republic; sixth—M. Goudchaux, ditto; seventh M. Darimon, editor of the Presse; eighth M. Yerm, former representative of the people; ninth M. Ferd Lasteyrie, ditto; tenth M. Regnault, former Sub-Prefect of Sennux.

Baron Mariani, candidate for the new circumscription given to Corsica, has issued a circular to the electors, in which the Baron states that the Emperor himself supports him, and that if any other person should present himself he would be guilty of an act of opposition to the sovereign will. The circular is accompanied, by way of support to its contents, by the following letter, addressed to the Baron by the Emperor

TUILERIES, May 9

My dear Commandant.—The Minister of the Interior has doubtless informed you that I have decided that you shall be the Government candidate in Corsica. You may therefore loudly proclaim it, for I shall be very happy if the confidence of the electors places you in the Chamber. Rely on my sentiments of friendship NAPOLEON.

The Ministers of the great Powers have been invited by Count Walewski to meet on an early day with the view of officially regulating the frontiers of Russia and European Turkey, on the bases laid down by the Congress, whose labours were at the time interrupted by the memorable Bolerad incident.

The King of Bavaria left Paris at half-past nine on Monday morning by the Strasburg Railway.

The Government has received despatches from Algeria to the 1st of June. They announce that there has been no further fighting. Marshal Randon has received the submission of the various tribes of whom he spoke in his previous despatches. The military operations have been so cleverly executed that all those tribes have paid their war contributions, and left as hostages for their submission their principal families, who have already arrived at Algiers. Independently of the fort, which is to be built in the centre of the country, the Marshal is constructing a carriage-road which will open this hitherto inaccessible place to commercial transactions and military operations. The health of the troops continues to be excellent, and the camp is abundantly supplied with provisions. The Marshal has fixed his headquarters at Souck-el-Arba, the highest point in the newly-conquered country. The Emperor has commanded the Minister of War to write to Marshal Randon to express his Majesty's satisfaction at the manner in which the expedition to Kabylia was conducted.

BELGIUM.

Tranquility seems to be pretty generally restored in this country. Several of the persons who had been arrested on account of the disturbances at Brussels have been set at liberty. A part of the troops called to the capital have been sent back to their former quarters.

SPAIN.

The Spanish Government maintains strict reserve with respect to the Mexican question; although there are rumours of an armed demonstration against Vera Cruz.

The treaty concluded between France and Spain for the settlement of the line of frontier of the Pyrenees has just been approved of by the Senate by a majority of 82 to 1.

The Address to the Throne was carried in the Congress, on June 2, by 221 votes against 10. Rios Rosas made an eloquent and powerful attack on the policy of the Government; and was replied to by Gonzales Bravo, who answered himself in a manner which gave great satisfaction to General Narvaez and the Government—so much so that it is said that half his speech was made out of the Cabinet, and half in it; so certain is it now considered that he will become a member of the Ministry.

In the Chamber of Deputies on the 3rd June the report of the committee on the bill sanctioning the levy of 50,000 men for the army, made by the Government, was approved of. A bill relative to the Mines Iean was then brought in, and ordered to remain on the table for three days. In the Senate the Marquis de Miraflores consented, at the request of the Minister of the Interior, to withdraw his bill for modifying the constitution of the Chamber.

It was rumoured that a Carlist insurrection was about to break out at Cervera and other places in the province of Lerida; and seditious proclamations had been posted up.

The population returns were being made up, and it was believed that they would show the total population to be about 15,000,000 souls.

NEUFCHATEL.

The Grand Council of Neufchatel has proclaimed a general amnesty in favour of the soldiers who did not obey the summons to arms in December and January last.

The Council have also remitted the sentences passed in 1849 against M. de Rougemont for offences of the press.

These decrees are, however, to be annulled if the treaty between Switzerland and Prussia be not ratified.

AUSTRIA.

A special train brought the mortal remains of the Archduchess Sophia from Pesth to Vienna on Tuesday week. The coffin, on being removed from the train, was placed on a catafalque covered with red velvet, in the middle of one of the rooms. Prince Charles de Lichtenstein, Grand Master of the Court, and several high dignitaries of the palace, afterwards proceeded to the official reception of the coffin, and some prayers were said over it. A procession was then formed, and it proceeded to the Convent of the Capuchines, in the chapel of which the great dignitaries of the State and the élite of the Austrian nobility were assembled. The usual funeral service was celebrated, and the coffin was deposited in the vault of the Imperial family by four Capuchin monks.

The Archduke Albrecht, the Governor-General of Hungary, has returned to Pesth, in order to be present at the opening of the Agricultural Exhibition. According to a letter from Vienna in the Nord of Brussels, the Emperor has charged the Archduke to continue the journey through that kingdom, agreeably to the programme drawn out for their Majesties, and to receive in the name of the Emperor the homage and the expression of the wishes of the inhabitants. The fêtes at Debreczin continued after the departure of their Majesties.

The Emperor has given his sanction to a plan for enlarging Vienna, properly so called, which city has for a long time past been insufficient for the accommodation of the constantly-increasing population.

SARDINIA.

It is said that the King of Sardinia is about to form a matrimonial alliance with the Royal house of Saxony. The Princess Sidonia, now in her twenty-fourth year, is spoken of as the future Queen of Sardinia; and the journey of the King of Saxony to Italy is probably connected with that expected event.

In its sittings of the last few days the Chamber of Deputies got through a great deal of work with very little discussion. It disposed of the estimates for the departments of war, finance, and public works, besides passing several other bills. There seems every probability that Parliament will be prorogued about the beginning of next month, and, as the present Chamber has nearly completed its full legal term of office (five years), the Government will, it is said, refer to the feelings of the country before commencing another session, so that a general election may be expected in the course of the autumn.

THE PAPAL STATES.

His Holiness the Pope is proceeding on his journey, amid the apparently hearty salutations of his people. He spent two days at Sinigaglia, the place of his birth, where he was very warmly received, and where also he celebrated mass in the chapel which contains the tombs of his family. On the 29th ult. he arrived at Pesaro, and the next day received there the visit of the Archduke Maximilian, Governor-General of Lombardy, who went there to compliment him, and to ask his special benediction on the marriage which he is going to Brussels to accomplish. On the 2nd inst. his Holiness was at Cesena, and on the following evening he entered Forli.

THE NEAPOLITAN CONCORDAT.

The Neapolitan Government has just made another step on that road of reform which it particularly holds to.

His Sicilian Majesty in Council has signed several decrees by which the encroachments of the clergy, and the most supernannated pretensions of the Court of Rome, are henceforward to be considered as an essential part of the Neapolitan legislation.

SWEDEN.

A letter from Stockholm, in the Gazette of Northern Germany, states that the King continues ill. His Majesty, it says, is labouring under nervous debility, which renders him incapable of deciding on important questions in the Council of Ministers; and, if his health should not speedily improve, it will be necessary that the Hereditary Prince should be charged with the Government.

The marriage of Prince Oscar of Sweden, second son of the reigning Monarch, with the Duke of Nassau's sister, took place at the Palace of Biebrich on the 5th inst.

TURKEY.

The affairs of the Danubian Principalities were the principal objects of attention. Redschid Pacha is anxious for the complete execution of the Treaty of Paris, and to that end had proposed M. Negri for the post of Caimacan of Moldavia. The influence of Ahmet Fethi Pacha, however, proved stronger, and Prince Konaki Vogorides got the appointment.

A fresh outrage has been committed at Pera, which has caused considerable consternation among the European population. On the night of the 22nd ult. the house of M. Timoni, first dragoman of the Swedish Legation, was broken into by a band of twenty armed men, who pillaged it of everything it contained of value. Fresh complaints have been addressed on this occasion to the Government by all the Ambassadors, who, it is said, have demanded the dismissal of the Minister of Police.

Bosnia is in a disturbed state. Above 6000 peasants of all religious creeds, and without fire-arms, are assembled near Tusla: they demand the reduction of taxes, the removal of abuses, and the realisation of the Hatti Houmayoun.

THE PRINCIPALITIES.

The Caimacan Vogorides has received the Grand Cordon of the Iron Crown from the Austrian Government, doubtless as a testimony of approbation for his conduct in opposing the union.

The project of mediation of Lord Clarendon for the Principalities has become, it is stated, the object of conferences between Count Buol and the representatives of France and Sardinia at Vienna. This project opposes the total union, but proposes to assimilate as much as possible the administration of the two provinces. The French Minister is said to have received instructions from his Government to admit the principle of the proposition.

PERSIA.

In pursuance of orders received by General Outram, the Persian expeditionary force is to remain in the Persian Gulf for three months after the ratification of the treaty, which was to take place on the 4th of June, under the authority of the Hon. Mr. Murray. The headquarters, staff, and the first division will remain at Bushire; the second division at Mohammorah. Under this arrangement it is not likely that the troops will reach India much before the close of the year.

Mr. Murray, Minister of England to Persia, quitted Bagdad on the 17th ult., with all the persons attached to his Legation, on his way to Teheran. He was accompanied by Ali Khan, who had been dispatched by the Court of Persia for that purpose.

INDIA.

A telegraphic despatch received at Bombay from Meerut states that the 3rd Bengal Cavalry were in open mutiny, and that several officers and men had been killed and wounded. It was reported at Calcutta that a correspondence had been discovered in possession of a native officer of the 34th Bengal Infantry, proving the existence of a conspiracy for organising a general rising of the entire army. The 34th is to be disbanded.

Respecting the disturbances at Umballah (of which some report reached us by the last mail) the Madras Athenæum of May 8th says:—

The disaffection occasioned by the order to issue the greasy cartridges, or whatever other cause may have led to the feeling, has extended to Umballah. The native troops stationed in that place have burnt down the empty European barracks, the native infantry hospitals, the officers' quarters, and sepoys' houses. Our authority the Delhi Gazette—adds that, in consequence of these acts, the order to use the greased cartridges has been countermanded pending a reference to the Commander-in-Chief, and that dragoons are patrolling the place, in order to prevent further outbreak.

Mohammed Youssouf, a man who some short time back played a considerable political part, and who assassinated the Prince of Herat, Kamran his turn, fallen by the hands of the sons of the murdered man. General Ashburnham, with his staff, arrived on the 4th ult. at Bombay, and left for China a few days after.

CHINA.

No fresh operations have taken place in the Canton river. Yeh is said to be embarrassed from want of money.

At Foo-chow uneasiness has been caused by accounts of disturbances and the presence of rebels in the tea districts.

At Hong-Kong all remains quiet.

The murderer of Mr. Markwick, Government auctioneer of Hong-Kong, after much shuffling diplomacy on the part of the Chinese authorities, has been surrendered, and will undergo his trial. The prisoner has made disclosures which prove that he had a number of confederates; that the murder of Europeans was projected on a large scale; and that rewards were offered for success by the Chinese authorities.

The Chinese who attacked Rajah Sir James Brooke at Sarawak, murdered Messrs. Wellington and Nicolette, and wounded Mr. and Mrs. Crookshank, have suffered a fearful retribution at the hands of the Malays, having been nearly extirpated from the country by their relentless pursuers. About 1500 hundred Cinnamen are said to have had their heads taken off by the Dyaks.

UNITED STATES.

No fresh step has been taken in the settlement of the Central American question. General Cass was stated to be drawing up a reply to Lord Napier's last communication.

Kansas advices to May 21 state that Secretary Stanton had issued a proclamation for the election of delegates to the Constitutional Convention on the third Monday in June. Returns from nineteen out of twenty-six counties were in, giving 9251 legal voters. It was said that many of the Republicans were going over to the Free-State National Democracy; also that an attempt was making by Northern Democrats to send Free-State men of that party to the Convention. It is supposed that the number of Free-State voters now in Kansas exceeds 15,000, which is increasing by hundreds every day; while the whole number of Pro-Slavery settlers is estimated not to reach 3000.

Utah, another territory, is likely to give the United States Government more trouble. The Mormons are now supposed to number nearly two hundred thousand, with not less than sixty thousand perfectly-armed fighting men—all fired with the most fanatical zeal for their faith, and entirely subject in all things to the will of their leader, Brigham Young.

The discourses of Brigham Young and other leading elders forcibly depict the necessity of perfect unity of thought and action among the "faithful."

Dred Scott and his wife and two daughters were emancipated at St. Louis on the 26th ult.

General Walker made terms of capitulation with the Costa Ricans on the 1st of May, having then less than 300 men, and but two days' provisions. Walker and staff arrived at New Orleans on the 27th ult., in the steamer Empire City. He was received by 10,000 people.

Mr. Soulé, late Commissioner to Bogota, who had arrived in Washington, expresses no doubt as to the eventual settlement of the difficulty between New Granada and the United States in a manner satisfactory to both parties.

MEXICO.

We have news from the city of Mexico to the 5th and from Vera Cruz to the 9th ult. President Comonfort had returned to the capital from Tacubay. There was an active canvass going on among the candidates for the Presidency and seats in Congress, and on the bench of the Supreme Court. Comonfort and Senor Leodo Tejada were the most popular candidates for the executive chair. The Archbishop was dangerously ill. Santa Anna's friends were intriguing for his restoration to power.

The reported execution of Colonel Crabbe and his party of Filibusters in Sonora is confirmed.

Another conspiracy to revolutionise the country had been detected. The assassination of the President and an attack on the city formed the basis of the plan of the conspirators. The leaders of the plot were arrested, and it was expected that they would be beheaded. It is said that Captain Nogueira, a protegé of Comonfort, was the person selected to commit the act of assassination, and that Aquilar was implicated in the affair.

CANADA.

After very long debate, the Grand Trunk Aid Bill has been at length carried through both Houses of the Canadian Legislature, and is certain to receive the assent of the Governor-General. It was introduced as a Government bill. The debating upon it was not unmixed with bitterness, arising from the scheme having been mixed up with politics.

Investigations before Committees of the House of Assembly have proved that railway jobbing, of the kind understood so well in England, has found its way into Canada, and tainted men belonging to some of the most respectable families in the country.

The Estimates were carried through the Committee of the House with very little discussion. The estimated expenditure for the current year is £1,620,647. Supplementary estimates for public works are promised to be sent down. The estimated revenue for the current year is £1,552,900. Of this the revenue from customs is put down at £1,200,000, but will probably be much more.

It is understood that after the Canadian Parliament rises the Governor-General (Sir Edmund Head) will visit England. This will be very shortly. A larger amount than usual of immigration has begun to make its way up the St. Lawrence. The spring is everywhere backward this year in North America.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

The Governor opened the Session of the Colonial Parliament with a speech, in which he congratulated the members on the position and prospects of the country. The relations between the colonists and the frontier tribes are now satisfactory, and the apprehensions which were lately entertained subsist no longer.

It is the intention of Government to fill up the vacant portions of Kaffraria proper, between the districts of Kreli and Faku, with a European population; and to use all its influence to persuade the Kaffirs to become an agricultural people. One of the most important subjects likely to be debated this Session is the separation of the eastern from the western province.

AUSTRALIA.

The Melbourne Parliament was to reassemble on the 15th, when the "verdict upon the O'Shannassy Ministry" would be given. The Argus says that the country has unmistakably pronounced against the new Ministry. Four out of the seven Ministers had, however, been re-elected. A vote of want of confidence was spoken of, with the adhesion of many who contributed to turn out the late Ministers.

Trade at Melbourne was very dull, from the apprehension of large imports.

The trial of Thomas Williams, Henry Smith (alias Brennan), and Thomas Maloney, charged with the murder of Mr. Price, the Inspector-General of the penal department in Victoria, on the 26th of March, was commenced by the Supreme Court on the 13th of April. The evidence was very full and direct. The trial lasted two days, and ended in the conviction of all the prisoners, Smith, however, being recommended to mercy by the jury on the ground that he did not actually strike a blow. Every prisoner denied his guilt. The Judge sentenced them all to death by hanging. Several prisoners remain to be tried for the same murder.

SKETCHES IN PARLIAMENT.

A somewhat prominent member of the Opposition the other night, with a simplicity which is often very characteristic of your clever, rising men, in withdrawing a motion, said that "members on his side of the House were quite aware how undesirable it was to press any subject of which the Government did not approve." In that is contained the whole philosophy of the present Session. Whatever the Government chooses to initiate or to support will be carried, and nothing else. A strong Ministry in such a case is a promoter of dull debates, and can afford to be gracious and patronising.

Not, however, that individual members of the Opposition, permanent or temporary, are wholly quiescent. In the debate on the subject of the camp at Aldershott there were indications of personal hostility to Ministers, and of no little "pluck," and, perhaps, of something more; for one honourable member, remarkable for his sympathies with, and labours on behalf of, the sick soldiery in the late war, was so fearfully vigorous, so loud, and a trifle so inconsequent, that persons who wished to account for this deviation from his usual elaborate suavity were obliged to observe that the hour was about eleven, and that the hon. member wore a white cravat and waistcoat. That debate was originated by a gallant officer, a new member, and apparently a very young man, who has assumed a very decided, not to say prononcé, position in the House; whose name may be seen figuring evening after evening in the list of questions to her Majesty's Government, and whose easy assurance is so undeniable that the Premier seems to have thought it required a check. Accordingly, when the hon. and gallant member repeated, in precisely the same terms, on Monday, a question which had been answered by the Under Secretary for War on Friday, Lord Palmerston rose with peculiar significance in his manner, and, with a severity most unusual in him, pointed out the breach of Parliamentary good taste which had been committed; and indicated in no very mistakable terms that the gallant member was, to speak slangishly, a great deal too fast, and must be put down. The House cheered the Minister, and the gallant member tossed his head (rather an odd-looking head, by-the-by), and did his best to avoid the appearance of a collapse. In fact, it would seem that Lord Palmerston is prepared to give lessons in that Parliamentary amenity of which he is a master; and it may be mentioned that some of his most rugged subordinates are profiting by his teaching and example in this respect. For instance, her Majesty's Attorney-General is becoming a model of graciousness and sweetness of demeanour. The manner in which he accepted Sir Frederic Thesiger's Bill for the Abolition of Grand Juries in the Metropolitan District was worthy of Lord Chesterfield; while the gentle criticism which he bestowed on the maiden speech of Mr. Serjeant Kinglake, on another measure, which certainly would have afforded strong temptations to the meekest of most urbane of officials, led one to believe that the chief law officer of the Crown has of late been taking large draughts of the milk of human kindness. That particular occasion was signalised by the début of another eminent barrister, at least the second at the Chancery bar, Mr. Rolt. That learned gentleman has modestly appropriated to himself a seat on the third bench on the Opposition side, very near the bar—a spot not very favourably situated for catching the Speaker's eye; so that when he rose at the same time with another member it was only general call of his name that gave him the "pas." That alone was a special compliment, for it is no secret that, numerous as they are in Parliament, the House has no sympathy with, and does not delight in, legal debaters; and, moreover, they had just heard a speech (they could not help hearing when the gentleman spoke as if we were addressing a jury on Salisbury Plain) from a member of the House of Commons, who bears some reputation too, of which it is perhaps best to say that it did not carry the House with it. To Mr. Rolt, however, every one immediately inclined, the ranks of members were turned en echelon towards the angle of the House in which he stood; there was a universal stillness, and they listened attentively to his neat, pointed, and argumentative speech, delivered fluently of course. But deliberately, and without a trace of the slipslop which so often disfigures that which, for want of a better word, we must call the eloquence of the bar. Twice in the course of his speech he got an encouraging "hear, hear;" once he got "a laugh;" and at the close he got three rounds of cheers. Now, all this made up a remarkable Parliamentary success; and Mr. Rolt may be certain of being listened to whenever he speaks with the same tact and discretion on subjects on which he can really inform and assist the House.

The chief, we will not say obstruction, but trouble, that the Government has met with since the recess has been on the Army Estimates, and more especially on the subject of Aldershott, already alluded to, and the Military Hospital at Netley. Whether Mr. Drummond's keen eye, which alone of all his organisation seems to exhibit vitality just at present, has discovered this chink in the armour of the Government, and he has set some of the skirmishers of his party to discharge their more or less effective arrows into it, it is not possible to say; but it is certain that he watched the desultory contest with evident gusto, and smiled as he only can smile when many of the most Liberal members twitted the Government in their little speeches, and walked into the lobby against them on the division, headed by, above all persons, Sir Robert Peel, who voted against his late colleagues on a question of administration a high crime and misdemeanour in an ex-subordinate official. Heads of departments, present and expectant, be sure, took a note of that. It is only such a man and Minister as the Premier who could afford to forgive such a petty exhibition of wounded amour propre as was thus displayed by the ex-Lord of the Admiralty.

A mightily angry among the strangers in Parliament is "Where is Mr. Gladstone?" He has not appeared in his place ten times since the meeting of the new Parliament, and not at all since the Whitsuntide recess. Some people conjecture that he no longer likes the seat he has been accustomed to occupy (he always showed great uneasiness in it). In the last Parliament Mr. Milner Gibson, who is the type of elegant and fine gentlemanlike Radicalism, used to interpose between Mr. Gladstone and the bluff and downright Liberalism of Messrs. Bright and Cobden; and the tableau thus presented was no inapt illustration of Mr. Gladstone's political status. Now there is no one to keep between him and the extreme Radical new member for Northampton, who has taken peaceable possession of the seat next to Mr. Gladstone, probably under the impression that, as Mr. Wright used to sit in it, it is held, as some lands forcibly are, by a tenure depending on the display of a coat cut according to the fashion of the Society of Friends. Be the cause what it may, the new Parliament knows not as yet the voice of Mr. Gladstone.

Can it be that the galvanised vitality which the House of Lords is exhibiting is owing to the return of Lord Brougham, who, invigorated by the breezes of Cannes, and fresh from the stimulating process of cramming up on the errors of the differential calculus before the British Association, has returned to his old haunts and has been ever since lapping about, as his manner is, from seat to seat in the House—joking with that Peer and lecturing this—making two or three speeches (the best he has made for years) on every subject, each from a different quarter of the Chamber, and ever and anon perching on the edge of that woolsack on which, alas! he is never destined again to nestle?

Cercles there must be some unknown stimulant, some legislative and oratorical philter, at work in the body politic of their Lordships when they could be induced to debate, and hotly too, till eleven o'clock one night, on a purely personal question—an appeal from the oft-repeated decisions of all the constituted legal tribunals of the country to the extraordinary powers of Parliament, on the part of an individual; and, surprising as it is, no less than thirty of their Lordships were found at that late hour, steadfast and constant enough to go through the ceremony of a division, which, under the new regulations for effecting that operation, adopted by the Upper House, involves rather more personal trouble than the former "fainéant" system which prevailed among the Peers.

The progress generally of the new Parliament is naturally watched with attention, and the result of observation, up to the present time, would seem to be that there is on the whole an improved class of members returned at the last election to the House of Commons. There are no indications of prominent absentees, but in the second rank of the new men the discussions in Committee have shown that there are not a few practical, ready, and business-like men, who know enough of the conduct of general affairs to be easily adapted into good working legislators. The orators are still, if not in the catepillar, at least in the chrysalis, state, and it is not likely that they will burst their cerements this summer.

SALE OF BEER BILL.

On the motion for the second reading of the sale of Beer Bill by Mr. Hardy,

Mr K. Seymer moved as an amendment that the bill should be read a second time that day six months. The measure, he contended, would seriously interfere with the freedom of trade, and restrict the legitimate enjoyments of the community, without accomplishing its avowed object, by diminishing the vice of drunkenness. Sobriety was to be learnt from the example of the higher classes, or inculcated by the diffusion of education, but could never be enforced by compulsory legislation. The bill was also objectionable as strengthening the monopoly now enjoyed by the great Brewers, whose influence was already paramount among the licensing magistrates, and not insignificant even in Parliament itself.

Mr. W. Brown, in seconding the amendment, explained the misconception by which his name had originally been inscribed as one of the promoters of the bill.

The bill was supported by Mr. Newdegate and Mr. D. Griffith.

Sir G. Grey gave credit to Mr. Hardy for the motive which had induced him to attempt dealing with so difficult and invidious a question. Reviewing the various measures that had been enacted or suggested with the view of regulating the sale of intoxicating liquors, the Home Secretary confessed that, almost without exception, they had all failed; but ventured to promise, on his own part, the introduction of a bill during the ensuing Session which would, he hoped, meet the chief evils now complained of. With this bill in prospect he suggested that the House should postpone legislation for the present.

After a few words from Mr. Kendall and Mr. Pacy,

Mr. Hardy intimated his intention to persevere with his motion, notwithstanding the opposition of the Government.

Mr. Villiers and General Thompson having briefly spoken in support of the amendment, and Mr. Barrow in support of the bill,

The House divided, and negatived the second reading by a majority of 213 to 18s.

PROPERTY QUALIFICATION.

Mr. Locke King moved the second reading of the Property Qualification Bill. This measure abolished the property qualification now required from members of Parliament, and made the system of representation in England in this respect, as the hon. member explained, similar to the practice which was formerly universal and still prevailed in Scotland.

The motion was seconded by Mr. Hadfield and opposed by Sir G. Grey, who abstained from discussing the question upon its merits, but submitted that all projects involving a change in the representative constitution should be held over until next Session, when the subject would be attached in a comprehensive manner by the Government.

After remarks from Mr. Corbett and Mr. Collier,

Mr. T. Duncombe objected to sacrifice the present bill except upon the assurance that the abolition of the property qualification would form an ingredient in the forthcoming Ministerial scheme for Parliamentary reform.

Mr Greene also supported the bill

Lord Palmerston, coinciding in the wish to postpone all discussion on the principle involved in the measure, invited the House to act upon the implied understanding, which, he said, had been hitherto invariably sanctioned, that every question connected with the representative system was to stand over until another Session.

The House then divided. For the second reading, 145; against, 204.

The Election Expenses Bill, which also stood for second reading, was withdrawn by Lord E. Grosvenor; as was the Registration of Voters' Bill by Mr. T. Duncombe, who severally accepted the result of the previous division as settling the fate of all analogous measures for the pending Session.

The Scientific and Literary Societies' Bill was read a second time.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

The Smoke Nuisance (Scotland) Abatement Bill was read a second time.

The Cinque Ports Act Amendment Bill passed through Committee.

BREACHES OF TRUST.

Lord St. Leonards drew the attention of their Lordships to the state of the law in equity regarding breaches of trust. The noble and learned Lord had proposed an amendment of the law for the relief of trustees during bona fide, and without any benefit to themselves.

Having brought in a bill for this purpose, some discussion ensued, after which it was read a first time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

Mr Roebuck withdrew his motion respecting the abolition of the office of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, which he had fixed for Tuesday next.

THE INDIAN ARMY.

Mr. Rich asked the President of the Board of Control whether, since the passing of the Act 16 and 17 Vict. c. 95, any measures have been taken for increasing the number of European officers in the sepoy regiments, for checking the drain of officers to civil employments, and for otherwise securing the constant presence with their regiments of a greater number of officers than at the time of the passing of that Act appeared to be the practice in the Indian army; also whether any measures had been taken to increase the general condition of the native officers, and for opening promotion to the rank of native officer at a shorter term than the twenty or thirty years' previous service by which it then appeared ordinarily to be obtained?

Mr. V. Smith said that a captain and an officer had been added to each sepoy regiment, and an addition had also been made to every European regiment.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER.

Mr. Wise called the attention of the House to the accounts of the Duchy of Lancaster, presented to Parliament in pursuance of the Act 1 and 2 Vic. c. 101, and moved an address for a return of all manors and estates now belonging to the Crown in right of the Duchy of Lancaster; how each grants and enfranchisements which have taken place since 1838; of the purchases and exchanges of land which have been made since the same period; of the date and term of all existing leases of the lands, mines, and rents of the said duchy. The hon. gentleman said his wish was not to expose abuses so much as to improve the nature of the property. The establishment consisted of sixty persons, the Chancellor receiving £2000 a year, the Vice-Chancellor £1000 a year, the Receiver-General £878 (who had little or nothing to do, as the rents are all paid into Coutts's), the auditor £200, clerks £2142, solicitor £200. In addition to these there were 1600 receivers and 21 stewards: added to which were charges for "sundries" to the extent of £1800 a year ("Hear, hear," and laughter). He believed that a great injury was done to her Majesty by the announcement of these and other extravagant charges, in which her Majesty did not at all participate. The whole of these revenues, he believed, were got rid of in mismanagement.

Alderman Copeland seconded the motion.

Mr Baines, Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, admitted that the establishment of the duchy was unnecessarily large; but, as that was owing to the number of patent offices which were held for life, it was impossible to procure the desired changes at once. No opportunity would be passed over of abolishing those useless offices as their present holders died off, and of otherwise reducing the expenses of management. At the same time he thought it must be admitted that an improvement had taken place in the management since her Majesty's accession. With regard to the alleged obscurity of the accounts, he should be happy to give any information or to submit them in future in any simplified form which might be suggested.

Mr. J. L. Ricardo expressed his opinion that a very poor reply had been given to the charges brought against the administration of the duchy.

Mr. Bass called attention to a custom by which, as a tenant of the duchy, he was called on to supply annually for her Majesty's kitchen nine pheasants, eighteen partridges, and eighteen hares (Laughter),—a custom, he thought, which was quite unsuited to the present age.

The motion was then agreed to.

THE GOVERNMENT OF INDIA.

Mr. Kinnaird called attention to the petition of Protestant missionaries in Bengal, and moved two resolutions: the first affirming the conviction of the House that the population were not secured good government by the present system, and the second asserting the opinion of the House that immediate steps should be taken to institute inquiries into the social condition of the people.

Mr Dunlop seconded the motion.

Mr. V. Smith opposed the motion, on the ground that inquiry was unnecessary, for it had been carried to its utmost limits, and every information on the subject was before the House. The matter was full of difficulty, which must have been felt by his hon. friend (Mr. Kinnaird), for he had three times altered the terms of his motion. It would appear from his speech that the only remedy he would find for evils complained of was the revival of the whole system of government in India. Measures were in contemplation to improve the administration of justice and to make the police system more effective. It was not very desirable that the missionary influence should be so great as to dictate to the British Government what ought to be done, as might be gathered from the recent conferences in the Indian army.

Sir E. Perry strongly condemned the system under which Judges were appointed in India.

Lord J. Russell thought that further inquiry was unnecessary, and that the time had arrived for active measures. The resolutions were a censure on the Government of India, and it was therefore not desirable to adopt them. He could not, however, regard the statement of Mr. Vernon Smith as perfectly satisfactory, for many grievances existed which ought to be corrected as speedily as possible.

Mr. Mangles opposed the motion.

After some further discussion, Mr. Kinnaird wished to withdraw the motion.

Mr. Hadfield objected to the withdrawal of the motion.

Mr. Evans moved the previous question, which having been seconded by Mr. Ayrton, the House divided, when the amendment of Mr. Evans was carried by a majority of 110 to 18.

Mr Massey obtained leave to bring in a bill to regulate turnpike trusts.

The Joint Stock Companies Act Amendment Bill passed through Committee.

The Sound Dues Bill was read a second time.

The following is an abstract of the Parliamentary proceedings on Friday night, the 5th inst., which appeared in our Town Edition last week:—

In the House of Lords, Earl Cowley took the oaths and his seat upon his elevation to an Earldom. The Ministers' Money (Ireland) Bill and the Princess Royal's Annuity Bill were read a first time. The Earl of Albemarle presented petitions from numerous shipowners belonging to the ports of Bristol and Southampton, complaining of the operation of some clauses in the Merchant Shipping Act; and Lord Stanley of Alderley pressed that the attention of the Government should be directed to the clauses objected to. The Probate and Letters of Administration Bill was read a third time; and some routine business was disposed of.

In the House of Commons, Mr. Keating, the new Solicitor-General, took the oaths upon his re-election for Reading; and Mr. F. Baring, on his re-election for Falmouth. Sir G. Grey (in reply to Lord R. Cecil) said he intended to introduce his Ecclesiastical Commission Bill next week. The Lord Advocate (in reply to Sir E. Colebrook) said it was not his intention to proceed with his Scotch Registration Bill during the present Session. In answer to an appeal by Sir J. Pakington to aid him in submitting his proposition on National Education upon an early day, Lord Palmerston, whilst admitting the importance of the subject, said he could not at present offer a Government night for its discussion. Mr. Adderley called the attention of the House to the abuse of election petitions, by which the privileges of the House were made the means of spreading libels and slanders upon members. Lord Palmerston pointed out the safeguards by which the right of petitioners was surrounded, and expressed his fear that any attempt at restriction might be attended with danger. After some remarks from Mr. Hadyard, Lord J. Russell, Mr. Labouchere, Mr. Roebuck, and Mr. Mullins, principally in connection with the case of Mr. Stuart, the subject dropped. The House then went into Committee on the Sound Dues; when the Chancellor of the Exchequer detailed the progress which had been made in the negotiations for the redemption of the Sound Dues, upon a capitalisation, dependent upon the same terms as the French, of a sum of £12,286; in consideration of the payment of which the Danish authorities had undertaken to abolish forthwith the Sound Dues and the Custom-house charges at the Danish ports. After a long discussion, in which Mr. Hadfield, Mr. Cobden, Mr. Bernal Osborne, and Mr. Hume took part, the House agreed to the resolution that the Army Estimates should be referred to a Committee of the whole House. Mr. Hadfield then moved as an amendment that the amount should be retrenched by £5,000. A division ultimately took place, which resulted in affirming the original grant by a majority of 158 to 98.

THE COURT.

The Queen and Prince Albert left Buckingham Palace, on Tuesday afternoon, for Windsor Castle. Her Majesty and his Royal Highness were accompanied by the Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal, Prince Alfred, Prince Arthur, the Princesses Alice, Helena, and Louise, and were attended by the Duchess of Athole, the Lady Caroline Cavendish, the Hon Flora Macdonald, Lord Camoys, Colonel the Hon. C. B. Phipps, Major-General Berkeley Drummond, Major-General Bouverie, Colonel F. H. Seymour, Mr. Grant, and Lieutenant Cowell.

The Royal party left the Palace at twenty-five minutes before four o'clock, in six of the Queen's carriages, escorted by a detachment of Light dragoons, under the Paddington terminus of the Great Western Railway, whence they travelled to Windsor by a special train, arriving at the Castle about half-past four o'clock.

On Wednesday their Royal Highnesses the Duchess of Cambridge, the Princess Mary, and the Duke of Cambridge, arrived at the Castle on a visit to her Majesty. Their Serene Highnesses the Hereditary Prince of Saxe Meiningen and Prince Edward of Saxe Weimar also arrived on a visit. The following distinguished guests also arrived at the Castle:—The French Ambassador and Countess Persigny, Earl Granville, the Duke of Wellington, the Prussian Minister and Countess Bernstorff, the Earl of Clarendon, the Earl and Countess of Besshorough, Earl Cowley, Viscount and Viscountess Palmerston, M. Fould, the Duchess of Sutherland, the Marquis of Ailesbury, the Marquis of Breadalbane, and the Earl Spencer. There was a large addition to the Royal dinner party on Wednesday, evening from among the nobility and gentry resident in the neighbourhood of Windsor. His Royal Highness Prince Frederick William of Prussia arrived at the Castle about ten o'clock on Wednesday evening from Berlin. His Royal Highness was escorted from Dover by Major-General Wyde on Thursday the hour visited the racecourse at Ascot in demi state. The Royal cortège consisted of eight of the Royal pony carriages, and was, as usual, preceded by the Master of the Buckhounds and a brilliant staff on horseback. Her Majesty was enthusiastically received by the spectators both in going to and returning from the racecourse. In the evening there was a grand dinner in St. George's Hall.

The Court returns to Buckingham Palace this (saturday).

THE DRAWINGROOM

The Queen's Drawingroom, on Saturday last, in St. James's Palace, was very numerously attended.

Her Majesty and the Prince, accompanied by the Princess Royal, arrived from Buckingham Palace at one o'clock, and were shortly joined by the Duke of Cambridge, the Hereditary Duke of Saxe Meiningen, and Prince Edward of Saxe Weimar.

Before the reception the Queen received a deputation from Christ's Hospital in the throne-room, and condescended to inspect the charts and drawings of the boys.

Her Majesty first received the diplomatic circle, in which several presentations were made. The general circle was next introduced. Among the more noticeable presentations were the following:—

The Marchioness of Abergorny, on succeeding to the title, by the Duchess of Beaufort.
The Countess of Cork and Orrery, by the Countess Spencer.
The Countess of Ross, by the Duchess of Inverness.
The Countess Eversley, by Lady Charteris.
Lady Ingram, by the Duchess of Beaufort.
Lady Cowell, on coming to the title, by her sister Mademoiselle Duprez.
Lady Barrow, on succeeding to the title, by Lady Burgess.
Lady Belper, by the Countess Granville.
Lady Arthur Hay, by the Duchess of Wellington.
Lady Adeline Maitland, on her marriage, by Lady Elizabeth Drummond.
Lady Elinor Cavendish on her marriage, by Lady Burgess.
Lady Evelyn Craven, by her mother, the Countess Craven.
Lady Agnes Graham by the Duchess of Buccleuch.
The Lady Mayoress, by Viscountess Palmerston.
Mrs Colquhoun, of Luss, by Lady Colquhoun.
Miss Henrietta Farquharson, by her mother, Mrs. Farquharson, of Invercauld.

At the Drawingroom the Queen wore a train of black silk, trimmed with black crape and bouquets of black flowers; petticoat black crape over black silk, trimmed with bouquets of black flowers. The diadem was of black jet with black feathers.

The Princess Royal wore a train of rich white glacé, tastefully trimmed with white crape and bugles. The petticoat white glacé, trimmed to correspond with the train. Her Royal Highness had round her head a wreath of white roses. The ornaments were pearls and diamonds.

THE PRINCE OF WALES.

His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales will, in the course of the present summer, make a tour on the Continent, residing for about six weeks on the banks of the Rhine at Koenigswinter, at the foot of the Drachenfels, where a commodious hotel has been engaged for his Royal Highness. It is expected that when the season advances his Royal Highness will proceed up the Rhine to Switzerland for the purpose of visiting the Alps.

His Royal Highness will travel incognito under the title of Baron Renfrew. He will be attended by Major-General the Hon. C. Grey, Lieutenant-Colonel Ponsonby, Mr. Gibbs, the Rev. Mr. Tarver, and Dr. Armstrong, R.N.

The baptism of the infant daughter of the Prussian Minister and the Countess Bernstorff took place on Monday at the residence of the Prussian Legation, on Carlton House-terrace, on which occasion her Royal Highness the Princess Royal stood sponsor to the infant. The Countess of Clarendon and the Earl of Westmoreland were co-sponsors with the Princess. The infant received the name of "Victoria Anna."

EN ROUTE FOR CHINA.

SKETCHES AT ADEN.

(From our Special Artist and Correspondent.)

We arrived at Aden at night. There was no mistake about our being again near Arabs; for their monotonous chant when they are coaling rose up in the night air, and in their yelling and talking they far outstripped their Egyptian brethren. In the morning we rowed ashore; mounted a donkey to see the sights; rode up wonderful rocks—break-neck places but fearlessly, on our sure-footed donkeys. We had just turned a corner, when, and all at once, Aden, with its white bazaar-houses, the mosque in the distance, and tents near us, burst upon our view. The 86th were firing away, and the effect was stunning. Well, we rode up in single file till we got up near the flagstaff—on either side of us a precipice of 800 feet: on one side the sea, on the other Aden; and our small path not more than three feet broad up at the top. The band played, and it was an inspiriting scene. We then got down into the town, rushed to the post-office, went into the fair, saw the printing press—and, wonderful to relate, some green shrubs; but the reservoirs were dry, there not having been rain for two years! The sun has not ceased shining for a month: and such a sun! so deliciously warm—86 deg. Fahrenheit. We breakfasted at the Prince of Wales Hotel, trying our hand at Hindostanee, the inhabitants being nearly all Hindoos. Having fed and smoked, upon the signal-gun being fired we made for the boats; and, amid the yells of the negroes—every one shouting out at the pitch of his voice that his boat was the best—we contrived, by shouting louder than they did, to get on board. Our transit was very slow, as we ought to have been at Point de Galle by this time. Mr. Bowring is one of the passengers, and we are great friends. Dr. Macpherson leaves us at Ceylon; he is bound to India.

I send you a truthful Sketch of Aden Beach, which to you will most likely appear exaggerated; but, so far from that being the case

THE BEACH AT ADEN: A RUSH FOR THE CANTONMENTS.

AN AFTERNOON IN THE TROPICS: INDIAN OCEAN. (See preceding page.)

many I crew on board have said that it was the reverse. First, you see a fellow surrounded by donkeys and their drivers. In the distance is the Hindostan coaling; whilst here and there, galloping or sitting still on their horses, are the negroes, some of whom, by way of coxcombry, dye their hair with lime until it is a bright red. In the distance you see a string of camels bringing in different things to the cantonments, which are three miles inland. In the foreground a negro boy is persuading two young fellows to buy some coral. Of course he asks double the real price, and then will ask for backsheesh. A man at Aden, after looking at me sketching for some time, wanted backsheesh for the pleasure he had conferred on me. To the right are three natives and a lady going to their encampments in the customary conveyances of the country, with the boys running behind them. Some Hindoos, one with a green umbrella, have just returned from the town, which is full of Hindoos. I have sketched a policeman and soldier. The soldiers are dressed all in white, with white cover to cap. The women, one an Arab and the other Hindoo, wear the dresses of their country. There are plenty of the mile-a-minute buffalo-carts. Most of the cadets bought ostrich feathers, and stuck them in their hats. The rock out at sea is the Lion, and is fortified.

Next is an Afternoon Scene in the Tropics, laziness of course predominating during the extreme heat. Some are sleeping, others smoking; some, less lazy than the rest, indulge in the game of bull—a species of quoits: the object is to get the round quoit on some number on the inclined board. On the paddle-box a Mussulman is at prayers, which he never misses towards sunset. The Captain is turning his back on the sheep-pens: these same black-faced and long-eared sheep, half fat and half tail, and ears hanging down. But our abomination is the ghee, or clarified butter, with which the negroes cook their curry.

After sunset various games are played by the amateurs, but I prefer watching the burning orb sink in a sea of fire, tinging the clouds with its gorgeous hues, while at the moment he sinks, and exactly opposite to him, rises the tropical moon, so calm, so bright, and so soothing; the stars twinkle, the southern cross shines in beauty; but this moon, oh, is like the beautiful things of this earth—dangerous, even more dangerous than the glaring meridian sun to sleep in: it brings all kinds of accidents, such as twisting the neck, closing the eyes, distorting the mouth, &c. Hark! 'tis the tea-bell. We rush below, we imbibe our tea or coffee, when dancing and singing on deck, and cards below, fill up the evening till grog time, which said grog having disappeared, the jovial part of the company retire to the forecastle, and singing is kept up till late. We land rain the other day off the Maldives, and now lightning every night, with falling stars. We soon turn in, regardless of noxious airs and other visitors, and sleep till the steward wakes us with cup of tea at six.

THE SURPLUS OF THE DUBLIN CRIMEAN BANQUET FUND.—A meeting of the subscribers to the Irish Crimean Banquet Fund was held last week at the Mansion House, Dublin, for the purpose of finally deciding upon the application of the balance of the funds collected which remained undisposed of. The chair was taken by the Lord Mayor. The gentlemen of the committee present were:—Sir George Morris, Captain Lindsay, Joseph Burke, Esq., of Elm Hall; the Hon J. P. Vereker, Carew O'Dwyer, H. Woods, and W. Donnelly, Esqrs. Mr. Joseph Burke, as honorary secretary, having read the minutes of the last meeting, Captain Lindsay moved, and the Hon. J. P. Vereker seconded, the following resolution, which was passed unanimously:—"That the sum now in the hands of the treasurers of the Crimean Banquet Fund be appropriated to the Royal Hibernian Military School."

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JUNE 13, 1857.

IF Peace have its victories as well as War, like War it has its troubles, its perplexities, and its dangers. India at the present moment affords a striking illustration of this truth. From Cabul and Belochistan to Birmah, and from the Himalayas to the Ocean, our arms have been victorious against all external foes. Our frontiers have neither assailants nor enemies sufficiently powerful and discontented to cause us anxiety. Internal enemies, as far as they exist in the shape of native potentates, with armies at their command, have ceased to trouble us. One by one their States have been "annexed" and absorbed into the unity of our great Indian Empire. The ancient Sovereigns have become the pensioners upon our generosity or our justice, and their subjects have learned to appreciate the benefits of the more stable and less rapacious government which has superseded that of their own countrymen. Great Britain, while holding her own in India by the force of arms, and by the prestige of invincibility which the successive victories of a century have thrown around the British name, has begun to turn the immense natural resources of the country to account, to extend its means of internal communication, to make railways, to open up rich districts, to promote irrigation, and the cultivation of cotton, tea, and other commodities in large demand in Europe; and to foster in a thousand other ways the industry and ingenuity of the most industrious and ingenious people in the world. But, amid all these realities of present, and prognostics of future, prosperity and peace, a sudden cause of alarm, if not of danger, has sprung up in an unexpected quarter. The native regiments, having nothing to do, and being, as it is alleged, vastly under-officered, have turned their enforced idleness to mischievous account. Rumours have been rapidly spread among them that the British Government had determined, upon system, to interfere with their religious rites and ceremonies—to make them touch the unclean thing, and to proselytise among them. These groundless rumours, not being sufficiently checked and contradicted by the presence and the exertions of British officers, associating with them and learning their feelings and prejudices, have passed from regiment to regiment, until open mutiny has been the result. In all cases the mutinies have been suppressed, and regiment after regiment has been disbanded; the native officers losing all claim to pay or pension from the Indian Government, but the same deprivation not being allowed to extend to the European officers. The question whether the insubordination and mutiny of the troops are not in some degree owing to the system by which, for the sake, we suppose, of economy, the native regiments are not officered by Europeans to the full extent required by discipline and efficiency is one of very high importance. The good Captain, no less than the good General, ought to know his men, and sympathise with them, not only in the exercise of merely professional duty, but in their amusements and their comforts. He should study their character, and not despise their prejudices of race and creed, if he really wishes to command them, or would turn their valour to proper account. If unacquainted with them he cannot acquire their confidence, on the one hand; and on the other, with a peaceful people like the Hindoos, he may ignorantly offend their most cherished notions of propriety and dignity, and unconsciously goad them to mutiny and rebellion. Here, then, are the remedies for the evil:—a more intimate study of the character of the Hindoo, or Sepoy, soldiery on the part of the British officers already in the service, and an immediate increase of the number of such officers to the extent required by efficiency. With efficiency will come safety; and rumours of a character to awaken the religious prejudices, or to excite the fanatical fears, of the native troops will cease to exist, or be dissipated at the moment of their birth. We do not believe that the Governor-General of India has lent himself to any project, great or small, for the Christianisation of the Hindoo people, attributed to him by an Indian journal, and brought under the notice of Parliament by Lord Ellenborough; neither do we believe that any political disaffection exists among the natives in any part of India; but, even without such sources of danger as either of these would be, a mutinous spirit among the troops is a danger sufficiently great to cause anxiety. Such a danger must be immediately confronted and removed. Unhesitating, inflexible severity to the actual mutineers, wherever and whenever they may declare themselves, accompanied by politic consideration for the religious prejudices, habits, and education of the troops where no mutinity has shown itself, may, if immediately employed, prevent the extension of the mischief. Fires cannot be allowed near powder magazines, and mutinies in India must be suppressed at any cost.

THE electioneering in France possess features that cannot but be interesting to the people of this country. The Emperor and the Imperial Government are accused by thoughtless politicians on our side of the channel of unduly interfering with the choice of the electors, and of dictating to them the candidates whom they shall support. But it may be asked, how, under the circumstances of France, could the Emperor act otherwise? Granting that there should be a Corps Legislatif, and that its members should be periodically elected or re-elected—points which the Emperor on the re-establishment of the Napoleonic system decided in the affirmative—and that the Corps Legislatif should be nothing but the shadow of the Imperial power and creature of the Imperial will—or, at the best, the mechanical aid of the Government and registrar of its decision—the whole power and authority of the State being vested in the Emperor himself—we do not see how the Emperor could tamely look on and allow the people to elect a legislative body unpledged to the support of the existing system. In English elections the stability of the dynasty and the occupancy of the throne are never questions for the electors. In France it is different. The real questions for decision among our neighbours are, the existence of the Empire instead of the Republic or the Monarchy, and the maintenance of the Imperial authority in the hands which actually wield it. In such a question it is not natural or possible that a man in the position of the Emperor can remain neutral. He himself is the candidate who seeks re-election, and the Deputies are but the trappings and the adjuncts of his power; and his tongue can no more be tied, or his hands fettered, on such an occasion, than those of an English gentleman seeking the suffrages of the free and independent electors of Rottentown. It would, undoubtedly, under all the circumstances of the case, have been more consistent with the ordinary ideas of a pure despotism, such as that which the Emperor has established and maintained, if he named the Deputies of the Corps Legislatif for life, as he does the members of the Senate, and abolished the farce of an election. He might have done this had it been his good will and pleasure; but, as he chose to leave the semblance of liberty, he can scarcely be blamed if he have determined that the semblance shall never be more than he intended it to be, and that it shall never be suffered to grow into a reality. Something of the same kind exists in our own country, where it is our habit to boast of our superior freedom. It is theoretically supposed that the Dean and Chapter of an ecclesiastical diocese in England have the liberty as well as the right to elect a Bishop. But the liberty, in fact, is non-existent, as everybody knows. Napoleon III. merely carries out the same principle in civil, which the English Government applies to ecclesiastical, affairs; and, if Englishmen object to the nomination by the Emperor of candidates to be elected by the people, they should object, for precisely the same reasons, to the nomination of Bishops by the Prime Minister of this country, and to the sham involved in their pretended free election by Deans and Chapters. It is remarkable, however, that the Imperial system in France, although upheld by so strong a will, by so inflexible a hand, and by so devoted an army, is not unquestioned at the pending elections, and that real freedom of opinion has manifested itself in several departments as well as in the capital. The men who have thus dared to question the wisdom of the Napoleonic system deserve, at all events, the praise of courage and of patriotism. If their candidature should happen to be successful, the Emperor will, perhaps, on his side have courage enough to relax the stringency of his Government, and to accept the challenge of M. Bosselet, by crowning with some small degree of liberty the edifice which he has founded. The English public will look on with curiosity, and will hope, for the sake of a man who has done so much for the consolidation of the alliance between the two nations, as well as for France itself, that he may find a greater security for his throne in the constitutional liberty of his people than in the incubus of great armies, and in a mode of government more fitted for a semi-barbarous than for a highly-educated and civilised nation.

TREATMENT OF LUNATICS IN SCOTLAND.

THIS subject, to which we adverted last week, has promptly received the attention of the Government. On Tuesday the Lord Advocate obtained leave to bring in a bill to amend the law relating to lunatics in Scotland. He proposes to appoint a Board, consisting of one commissioner, a medical inspector, a secretary, and a clerk; and the Board is to have the power of granting and refusing licenses for asylums, of making regulations for them, and generally of supervising the whole system. The inspector will be bound to visit the asylums at least twice a year. Perhaps these regulations are as simple and effective as can well be made. The medical inspector will, in fact, be the chief responsible person, and if he be judiciously chosen the plan will probably work well.

To continue our notice of the Report, which we commenced last week, we must remark that there are no means of forming an opinion concerning the increase or decrease of lunatics. It is generally supposed that they increase with civilisation faster than population. This, however, seems to be an error. The proportion of insane to population at present in Scotland is 1 to 300; and the Commissioners conclude that "there are grounds for thinking that civilisation, which leads to an improved condition, is not productive of insanity." They point out the very curious fact, that in a stationary condition of the population, where the same families frequently intermarry, the number of congenital idiots and imbeciles is proportionably large; tending to show generally that an intermixture of races and peoples such as is now very palpable in almost every part of the world – preserves or increases both the bodily and mental vigour of the human race. The Commissioners also point out that in a population rapidly increasing the number of idiots and imbeciles is proportionably small. "A high-land population contains," they say, "more than three times the number of congenital cases of mental disease than is found in an equal lowland population." The difference is more marked if only two counties as representatives of the classes – such as Orkney and Shetland on the one hand, and Lanarkshire on the other – are compared.

Another very curious and very important fact which the Commissioners, if not the first to set in a true light, have made very clear is "that scanty and inustritious food has a powerful influence in weakening the mental powers and inducing insanity;" and "that poverty and mental disease are closely allied." The pauper population (79,857) though not much greater than one fortieth part of the people, supplies 1-16 of the lunatics, or more than one half of the whole. That poverty and low diet promote insanity—,hat a generous diet, an increasing population, and improving civilisation are favourable to sanity—are important facts, distinctly proved in detail by the Commissioners, and which ought to be made widely known, and carefully pondered on.

There is yet in Scotland, as in England, much unnecessary and cruel restraint on lunatics; but nobody can deny the necessity of keeping dangerous lunatics completely under control. This is the foundation of the State interfering with them, and not leaving them, as it leaves persons afflicted with other diseases, to the care of their relatives. Individuals sometimes want the means, and sometimes the will, to protect the public against their lunatic friends; and before they were as sensible of this duty as they now are the State took it on itself

Another painful subject adverted to by the Commissioners is the great number of fatuous women who become mothers, and whose children are, in the majority of cases, fatuous like themselves. We forbear to advert in detail to so delicate a subject; but numerous examples quoted by the Commissioners impress us with a very unfavourable idea of the domestic arrangements, as to morality, of the poor in Scotland.

The Report convinces us that the establishments for lunatics, and the treatment of them, are much worse at present in Scotland than in England; but we have so recently made our improvements, and have yet so much to improve, that we are not authorised to boast of ourselves at the expense of our neighbours. The treatment of the insane is one of the nicest parts of medical art, and the one to which science has perhaps been most backward in lending its aid. Insanity is yet a great problem requiring solution, though we have learnt to treat it more judiciously. Is Nature, by the creation of immature or imperfect beings, still trying her "prentice hand," and aiming at "perfection not yet attained"? or are these wrecks of humanity the results of our ignorance and neglect, in tended, by the powerful impression they make on us, to warn us against something we ought not to do? It is a great mystery; though many remarks of the Commissioners point to privations and want as the causes of insanity, and lead to the supposition that in improved morality and civilisation a cure may be found for the affliction.

Of this extremely elaborate and luminous Report, minutely describing the whole large subject, we must content ourselves with this notice. The scientific gentlemen lately employed by the Government on various missions have done honour to it by the care they have taken to do their work well, and none have done it better than the Commissioners for Inquiring into Lunatic Asylums in Scotland. It is not their fault if their Report does not reflect as much honour on their country as on the Government and on themselves. Being voluminous, it is very properly accompanied by a copious table of contents, and an index, which, if we may judge from the little use we have made of it, seems perfect.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

OXFORD.

The annual commemoration of the opening of Cuddesdon College took place on Tuesday, and was attended more numerously than on any former occasion. Prayers were said at eleven; and at two the company, amounting to from 200 to 250, sat down to a cold collation under a tent erected in the grounds of the Bishop's palace. Speeches were made by the Bishop of Oxford, by Mr. Gladstone, M.P.; Sir W. Heathcote, M.P., the Bishop of Kentucky, the Hon. Mr. Gordon, Mr. Liddon, Vice-Principal of the College, and others.

The new statute relating to the middle-class examinations, which was promulgated on a former occasion, was on Wednesday afternoon again brought before congregation, and put to the vote, a separate vote being taken on the title of Associate of Arts. The statute provides that an examination of candidates who are not members of the University shall take place twice a year, either at the University or elsewhere one for boys under the age of fifteen, to be called Juniors; and one under the age of eighteen, to be called Seniors. The examinations shall be made in the two points of religion unless parents or guardians shall desire otherwise, Hebrew literature, history, languages, mathematics, and physical science; and in the rest of the subjects belonging to a liberal education. Those candidates, either senior or junior, who shall satisfy the examiners, shall be entitled to testamur, and take the appellation of A.A. Upon the votes being taken, the Vice-Chancellor announced the following numbers:—Placets, 81; non-placets, 36. The announcement was received with great cheering. The cause relating to the title "Associate of Arts" was then put to the vote, when the Vice-Chancellor again announced the result, namely, Placets, 62; non-placets, 38. The decision was received with great applause.

THE UNIVERSITY OF DURHAM AND MIDDLE SCHOOLS.—At a convocation held on Tuesday the following grace was submitted to the house:—"The Warden and Senate shall be empowered to propose a scheme for an annual examination on the following principles, with a view to its being submitted to convocation in Michaelmas Term next. That in such an examination shall be directed to such objects as are usually comprised in a good commercial education. 2. It shall be open to all who present themselves with proper testimonials, on payment of a certain fee. 3. It shall be arranged partly for junior candidates who are under fifteen, and partly for senior candidates who are beyond that age. 4. It shall be available for attaining academical distinction."

THE NEW BISHOP OF NORWICH.—On Thursday morning the Hon. and Rev. J. T. Pelham, D.D., was consecrated to the Bishopric of Norwich, in the parish church of St. Marylebone, of which he has been for the last three years the Rector. His installation of the new Bishop in the cathedral church of his diocese is fixed to take place on Friday, the 26th inst. His Lordship will commence a confirmation tour on the 6th of July.

GENERAL ORDINATIONS were held on Sunday last (being Trinity Sunday) by the Archbishop of York, at Bishopsthorpe; and, at their respective cathedrals, by the Bishops of Bath and Wells, Carlisle Chester, Chichester, Ely, Exeter, Gloucester and Bristol, Hereford, Lichfield, Lincoln, London, Manchester, Oxford, Peterborough, Rochester, and Salisbury, at which large numbers were admitted into holy orders, and many licensed to curacies.

THE Bishop of Rochester held a confirmation at Chatham on Sunday of the troops belonging to that garrison, and a large number of officers and young soldiers attended for the purpose.

ON Whit-Tuesday last the pupils of Mr. Simpson's school, at Bury St. Edmunds, presented to the Rev. C. J. Phipps Eyre a handsome set of robes, as a mark of their esteem and appreciation of his spiritual labours, and of their gratitude for his kind and voluntary attendance at the school during six years, and their regret at the termination of his visits by his removal to the metropolis.

THE foundation stone of a new Anglican cathedral has been recently laid at Montreal. About 5000 persons assembled on the occasion. A magnificent edifice will be erected, at a cost of about £30,000.

PREFERMENTS AND APPOINTMENTS.—Rectories: The Rev. G. D. Johnstone to St. Creed, Cornwall; Rev. C. Wilkinson, Wilcote, near Melton Mowbray; Rev. G. Petch to Oddington, Gloucestershire. Vicarages: The Rev. S. Bateman to South Scarle, Nottinghamshire; Rev. W. T. H. Fales to Yealmpton, Devon; Rev. J. Morton to Chew Prior, Worcestershire; Rev. J. Ormond to Little Hampden, Bucks; Rev. R. Vautier to Kenwyn and Kea, Cornwall; Rev. C. R. W. Waldy to Gussage All Saints. Incumbencies: The Rev. J. Moorhouse to Abbeyfield near Sheffield; Rev. W. Iveveson to St. Barnabas Church, Liverpool; Rev. G. Herner to Malsmore, near Gloucester; Rev. E. Geare to Woodstock. Perpetual Curacies: The Rev. J. A. Leakey to Topsham, Devon; Rev. W. H. Marsh to Little Compton, Gloucestershire; Rev. W. H. Spencer to Daresby, Cheshire. Curacies. The Rev T. B. Bartlett to Swire, Dorset; Rev. E. B. Frith to Stoke Canon, near Exeter; Rev. F. H. Moore to St. George, Easton-in-Gordano, Somerset.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE, LONDON.—On Wednesday afternoon a special meeting of the members of the above college was held at the college, in Gower-street, for the purpose of considering what steps ought to be taken with reference to certain apprehended alterations in the constitution of the University of London, intended to dispense with the necessity of candidates for degrees in arts and laws being educated in any college affiliated to the university. Lord Brougham, the president of the college, occupied the chair. Mr. Richard Martineau having read the amended charter and pointed out the difference between it and the existing one, a resolution was proposed and carried disapproving of the proposed change. "as one likely to be injurious to the cause of regular and systematic education, and as not only lowering the present standard, but the very meaning of an English university degree." Two other resolutions, in unison with the above, and for carrying out the views of the meeting, were also carried.

LONDON DIOCESAN CHURCH-BUILDING SOCIETY.—At the meeting of this association on Monday it was agreed to give the committee authority to make grants (under certain regulations) towards the stipends of additional clergymen who may be appointed to labour in districts where there is as yet no church, but where it is intended to build one. The society will not hereby interfere with the valuable operations of the Additional Curates or Pastoral-Aid Societies, by whose agency assistance is given to the incumbents of existing churches. But, wherever a clergyman wishes to cut off part of his parish with a view to its forming hereafter a district, the society will gladly help him to find a living one or more missionary clergymen annually, the people to prepare the ground for a more complete parochial organisation, and to lay the foundation of the spiritual temple, while the preparations for the material church are in progress. Five temporary churches have been opened during the past year.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

LORD PALMERSTON received a deputation, on Tuesday, of members of the medical profession representing the Colleges of Physicians and Surgeons of the United Kingdom, the Universities of Oxford and Dublin, and the various medical professions, on the subject of the medical bills now before the House of Commons. The deputation, in an interview of two hours, spoke strongly in support of Mr. Headlam's bill.

THE PARLIAMENTARY OATHS BILL.—A deputation, comprising Catholic noblemen, members of Parliament, and other influential gentlemen, waited on Lord Palmerston on Monday, at his private residence, for the purpose of urging on his Lordship the propriety of including in the bill for the relief from the object oaths passages in the Roman Catholic formularies of the legislature. The deputation was introduced by Lord Petre, the Duke of Norfolk. A meeting was held subsequently at the Salford-street Club, Piccadilly, his Grace the Duke of Norfolk in the chair, at which it was resolved "That Lord Palmerston's explanation to the deputation from this meeting not being considered satisfactory, the meeting recommends that an amendment in Committee, generally resembling the views submitted to his Lordship by his Grace the Duke of Norfolk, be supported by the Catholic members." That a petition be drawn up, and circulated for signature, embodying the wishes of the Catholic community;" and "That this meeting stand adjourned until one o'clock of the day following that on which the House of Commons might come to a decision on the amendment referred to, for the purpose of considering the course which it may become the duty of the Catholic body to pursue."

THE AUSTRIAN FLOWER SHOW.—On Saturday last Mr. Wild's exhibition of the season was opened to the public in the grounds of the Royal Botanic Society, Regent's-park. Notwithstanding the counter attractions of the Drawingroom, the Italian Operas, the fashionable parties and its crowds of visitors, the gardens were well attended. Here were to be seen grouped together in one gorgeous mass the lighter shades of the purely American plants, and the diversified hues of the Himalayan rivals, as well as those proofs of man's power over the beauty as well as the fertility of nature, in the new forms and new tints produced by his resistible impregnation of the rhododendrons of the Old and New World. The flowers will remain on show until the end of the month.

ENTERTAINMENT TO LORD EVERSLEY AT BOODLE'S CLUB.—On Saturday last a splendid dinner was given to Viscount Eversley by those members of Boodle's Club who had sat in the House of Commons under the presidency of the noble Lord. Some distinguished members of the nobility were also present. The high position that "Boodle's" has for so many years occupied, as the rendezvous of the leading landed aristocracy, independent of any political feeling, is still upheld, as the gathering on this occasion to do honour to the distinguished guest amply proved. The chair was taken by Colonel Tyrwhitt Jones, M.P. for Berks, and the vice-chair was occupied by Colonel Kenrick Tynte, M.P. for Bridgewater. The entertainment was of the most recherché description, including every luxurious delicacy of the season.

METROPOLITAN FREE HOSPITAL.—The anniversary festival of this charity was held on Wednesday, at the London Tavern, Bishopsgate-street Lord John Russell, M.P., in the chair. Th Princes of Oude were present, and their appearance excited much attention. About 200 gentlemen sat down to dinner. At the close of the evening the amount of subscriptions received was announced at nearly £1400. Among the donations were those of the Prince of Oude, £20; the Nawab of Sanit, £10.

POPLAR HOSPITAL. This institution has been lately established for the benefit of the workmen of the Victoria and other docks of the port of London. Its anniversary meeting took place at the London Tavern on Wednesday, when its supporters dined together. Mr. T. Fleming Mills, M.P., presided. Among the company (which numbered about 100 gentlemen) were the representatives of most of the eminent firms connected with the shipping and shipping interests. The total amount of subscriptions for the evening was £1860.

ROYAL DISPENSARY FOR DISEASES OF THE EAR.—The annual meeting of the governors and friends of this institution was held on Thursday, at the Dispensary Boars-street, Soho-square, David Lamb, Rector of West Hackney, in the chair. The report stated that the institution was established for the purpose of affording relief to the poor suffering under the malady of deafness. During the two years of Mr. Harvey, the surgeon attached to the institution, the relief granted has been of the most satisfactory character. During the past year 1746 had been admitted, of whom 948 had been discharged cured, and 286 greatly relieved.

CUMBERLAND BENEVOLENT INSTITUTION.—The anniversary dinner of the friends and supporters of this institution took place at the London Tavern on Saturday last, under the presidency of Mr. Joseph Ferguson, the late member for Carlisle. A numerous party of Cumbrian gentlemen assembled on the occasion. The object of the institution is the relief of distressed persons natives of Cumberland resident in the metropolis; and it appeared from the statement read by the treasurer, Mr. Reay, that at at the present moment there are forty-three pensioners in the receipt of the bounty of the society. To the public address it is then by the chairman and other speakers the company responded by subscribing the sum of £353.

ROYAL HUMANE SOCIETY.—On Monday the annual festival of this institution was held at the London Tavern. Eighty-three years have now elapsed since its founders made known the benevolent purposes which they desired to accomplish, viz.—"First, to collect and circulate the most approved and editorial methods for recovering the apparent dead, secondly, to suggest and provide suitable apparatus for the preservation and restoration of life; and thirdly, to bestow rewards on those who assist in securing either of these objects." During that period much more than could have been at all anticipated has been accomplished. The chair at Monday's banquet was filled by Mr. Russell Gurney, the Recorder of London; supported by Mr. Serjeant Hawes, Mr. Sydney Gurney, Mr. Sheriff Keats, and Mr. Dallas, the American Minister. About one hundred and sixty persons sat down to dinner. The subscription amounted to £765.

THE CONSERVATIVE LAND SOCIETY.—The nineteenth quarterly meeting of the members was held at the offices, 33, Norfolk-street, Strand, on Tuesday, the 9th inst. Viscount Ranelagh in the chair. The report of the executive committee congratulated the members on the success of the experiment made, in April last, of allotting houses leased and occupied; the villa residences on the St. Margaret's Estate not only having been chosen with early rights of choice, but considerable premiums were paid to secure these excellent investments. The receipts to June 6th amounted to £36 5s 9s 11d. Total number of shares, 13,343. The total sale of land was £3,000 – viz. 2d. A drawing afterwards took place for one hundred rights of choice, and fifty were added by scrutiny.

TENTERIDE-FOILS AT A DISCOUNT.—To the nuisance which these foils are the public may add that of cheapness, having become a drug in the market. On Wednesday a meeting of the trustees of the Middlesex and Essex turnpike roads was held at the Swan Inn, Stratford, to let by auction, for the term of two years from the 29th of September next, in four districts, the tolls collected at the respective gates within that jurisdiction, and which were offered at the sums they realised last year, above the expenses of collecting them. Among the leases connected with the metropolitan trusts present there was not the slightest competition for the property. The following were the districts, and the sums tolls produced in the course of last year:—The Bow district, £4740; the Stratford ditto, £2920; the Ilford and Romford ditto, £3230; and the Woodford ditto, £1620. There was no offer for either of them.

NEW CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH SCHOOLS, ROTHERHITHE.—The great increase of population in this locality having rendered an increase of free-school accommodation desirable, the members of the above church, with the aid of the reverend ministers of the district, raised subscriptions for that purpose, and purchased an eligible site of ground abutting upon the Lower-road, Rotherhithe, whereupon to erect schools to hold about 450 children. Mr. John Locke, M.P. for Southwark, having kindly consented to lay the foundation-stone, that ceremony took place on Wednesday, a large assemblage of ladies and gentlemen congregating on the occasion. The proceedings commenced with a hymn, given out by the Rev. D. Nimmo, followed by a Scripture reading and prayer, by the Rev. W. Benson and W. Lucy. The Rev. C. C. Smith, the minister of the church in connection with the above schools, read the scroll, declaration, &c. which were placed in the depositum. The stone was then laid in due form by Mr Locke, who addressed the assembly, expressing the pleasure he felt at being able, so recently after his return as a representative of the town's folk, to aid in forwarding education, and adding that he should at all times be ready to afford similar aid to any portion of his constituents, and he sincerely wished every success to the undertaking.

TRINITY HOUSE.—Last Monday being Trinity Monday a special general court was held at the Trinity House, on Tower-hill, at which his Royal Highness Prince Albert was unanimously re-elected Master, and Captain John Shepherd Deputy Master, of that ancient corporation, for the ensuing year.

ON Wednesday a Court of Directors was held at the East India House, when the Right Hon. Sir Lawrence Peel was sworn in a director of the East India Company, and took his seat at the board accordingly. Lieut.-General Sir James Outram, K.C.B., was appointed on the 3rd inst. a provisional member of the Council of India.

THE annual meeting of the governors and friends of the Royal Westminster Ophthalmic Hospital, King William-street, Charing-cross, takes place on Saturday (to-day), at three o'clock his Grace the Duke of Richmond in the chair

THE NAUTILUS DIVING BELL.—The operations of a recently-invented diving-bell, free from nearly all the defects of those commonly used, and offering very many special features, were witnessed on Saturday, at the Victoria Docks, by a numerous body of visitors, at the invitation of a company, entitled "The Nautilus Submarine Company," which has been formed in America to carry out this most useful invention. The Nautilus resembles a common kitchen-boiler rather than a bell, having a round man-hole at the top, with a lid removable for the entrance of passengers. In the interior there is an oval or oblong chamber where seated persons can stand upright; and on each side are compartments which contain air. The extreme simplicity of the apparatus, and the apparent certainty of its action, were at once evident from a few trials. There can be no doubt that in the Nautilus a new and valuable aid is afforded to the engineer, by which the construction of harbours, bridges, docks, and other works, any part of which may be beneath the water, will be greatly facilitated. It has been for some time in use at the Victoria Docks in repairing the iron sills of the dock-gate, and its superiority over the old diving-bell has been so great that by its aid, it is said, more than five times the amount of submarine work has been done than would have been completed by the former apparatus within the same time. Several persons descended in the machine on Tuesday, and they experienced none of the unpleasant sensations which are generally felt in diving-bells.

BIRTHS AND DEATHS.—Last week the births of 774 boys and 769 girls, in all 1543 children, were registered in London. In the corresponding weeks of the years 1847-56 the average number was 1405. The returns for the week that ended on Saturday, June 6, exhibit the gratifying fact that the remarkably small number of 868 deaths was registered in that period in London. The deaths now returned are less by 205 than the average rate of mortality at this period of the year would have produced.

A POLICE CONSTABLE SHOT BY A BURGLAR.—Charles Molbourne, a desperate looking fellow, a well-known burglar and thief, appears to have been committed for trial, from the Marlborough Police-office, on Saturday last, on the charge of firing a loaded pistol at Police Constable Thomas Hickmott, and wounding him, with intent to murder him. The firing took into custody in the Haymarket for a burglary the prisoner deliberately took a pistol from his pocket and shot the policeman in the mouth. Hickmott, the policeman who came to the rescue of his comrade was then shot at by the wretch, but happily without effect. On the prisoner were found a long bowie-knife, with spring back, four round pebbles to fit the pistol produced, a quantity of small shot and copper caps, a rammer, and two locks of barrels.

CHARGE OF SHOOTING WITH INTENT TO MURDER.—W. Moyce, coachman, of George-street, Bromley, was charged at the Thames Police-court, on Monday, with shooting at Mr. John Hickmott, brother to the Metropolitan-road, with intent to murder him. Mr. Hickmott was so seriously wounded as to be unable to attend at the court. Accompanied by a friend, he assisted him and two policemen to Mr. Hickmott's house, which is in possession to the cottage and garden occupied by the defendant. The cottage was broken open and the furniture about to be removed, when the defendant came up, took aim at a person, and said he would "shoot somebody." On being remonstrated with he fired the gun into the air. The removal of the furniture went on, and a short time afterwards Moyce again presented the gun and fired it at Mr. Hickmott, wounding him in the right side. The prisoner was remanded till Saturday (to-day).

FATAL ACCIDENT AT THE ST. KATHARINE DOCKS.—An inquest was held on Monday at the London Hospital, on view of the body of Daniel Miller, aged forty years, who lost his life under the following circumstances:—The deceased was a lighterman, and on the previous Tuesday, while engaged assisting in the transmission of a quantity of bales of wool from one of the warehouses in the St Katharine Docks, by means of a crane, one of the links of the chain connected with the machinery gave way, and the ponderous mass fell upon the deceased, crushing him in a frightful manner. He was conveyed to the London Hospital, where he died shortly after his admission. The jury returned a verdict of "Accidental death."

FATAL ACCIDENT TO A YOUTH.—On Monday an inquest was held at the London Hospital respecting the death of James Lee, aged 16 years. The deceased was standing on the previous Thursday near the loading gate of the steamboat wharf at Wapping, when he slipped and fell, when his neckerchief became entangled with the machinery, whereby he sustained extensive injury to the neck. He was removed to the London Hospital, where, by the operation of tracheotomy, he breathed again by making an incision in the throat, by which means the life of deceased was prolonged for several hours; but subsequently fatal symptoms supervened, and deceased expired on the Friday. Verdict, "Accidental death."

UNTIMELY END TO A DISSOLUTE LIFE.—On Tuesday was resumed the adjourned inquiry respecting the death of Thomas Backlevie, alias Fyfe, who died last week from injuries under somewhat suspicious circumstances. He was found in Rosemary-lane, on the morning of Monday week, by a police constable in a state of insensibility, with several bullet wounds on the back of his head, which was bleeding. From the evidence of a daughter of the deceased, and of Sergeant Fox, it appeared that the deceased was of very intemperate habits, and, as well as his wife (now in prison for disorderly conduct), was known as a most of the police stations. Three of his younger children were in the workhouse, owing to their parents' dissolute habits. The jury returned a verdict that the deceased died from concussion of the brain, caused by a fall, being a man of intemperate habits; and the jury at the same time begged to express their thanks to the police for the prompt attention exercised in the matter.

"MAN-STALKING."—The secret society known to exist at Paris under the title of France-Juges, or Free-Judges (the trial and sentences of some of the members of which we gave last week), was most difficult to be taken hold of; but the thing was managed at length. Agents were incessantly watching the five or six individuals who figured as principals in the tribunal. At length, a gendarme, who had been initiated against each contained, like a black book, daily notes made with incredible accuracy by the police, respecting their lives, habits, conversations, and acts. The perseverance, address, and boldness employed by the police in the course of this vigilant surveillance were not a whit inferior to what Cooper relates of the North American Indians following the trail; or to the exploits which Balzac attributes to his Contresons, Peyrades, and Corentin. For instance, one December night, the secret members were to meet behind the Cemetery of Père la Chaise, for the purpose of admitting some neophytes. Two agents contrived to dog them, by crawling on all fours, with naked feet, along the ditches full of ice, by the roadside. To get to their place of meeting the conspirators left the high road and took their way across the fields. The trackers did not give up the pursuit—they crawled as before in the mud, like two lizards, and got, without being perceived, within four paces of forty men, armed with knives, and, of course, not disposed to give any quarter to informers. In this way these two men were enabled to collect from the lips of the speakers some valuable facts wherewith to draw up the indictment.

HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE, K.G., &c., GENERAL COMMANDING-IN-CHIEF.

INAUGURATION OF CALTHORPE PARK: THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE PLANTING A TREE.

INAUGURATION OF CALTHORPE PARK, BIRMINGHAM.

THIS park (presented by Lord Calthorpe as a place of public recreation to the artisans of Birmingham) was formally inaugurated on Monday week by his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge. The day was unusually fine, and observed as a general holiday in the manufactories, for whose inmates the grounds are intended as a place of out-door pleasure and amusement. The new park consists of five meadow fields thrown into one piece of about thirty acres, intersected with gravel walks, and planted, in addition to the old trees, with a variety of choice, if not highly valuable, shrubs. The surface of the ground is somewhat flat, but the neighbouring hills of Edgbaston and Moseley, by which it is surrounded, give the scene a picturesque effect. It is situated on the Hereford road, about a mile and a half from the centre of the town, and is in all respects admirably suited for the objects to which it has been dedicated.

His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge arrived at the Great Western Railway station, Snow-hill, at about half-past twelve, and, after a short stay, accompanied the Mayor to the Townhall.

The magnificent hall was crowded with company; the galleries chiefly occupied by ladies; the organ-gallery by children of the various charity-schools for the purpose of singing the National Anthem; while on the floor were from 300 to 400 noblemen, clergy, and gentlemen. The hall was appropriately decorated for the occasion, drapery being suspended from the organ-gallery; and in the centre of the floor was erected a dais, covered with crimson cloth, on which was placed the official chair of the Mayor.

The Duke of Cambridge arrived at a quarter to one o'clock, and, his Royal Highness having partaken of luncheon in the committee-room, the Duke was ushered into the hall. His reception was most enthusiastic. The whole audience stood up, the ladies waved their handkerchiefs and the gentlemen their hats, and the organ struck up the National Anthem. His Royal Highness gracefully acknowledged the very warm reception by which he was being greeted, and took his place in the chair on the dais, the Mayor standing on his right hand. The Town Clerk then read a congratulatory address from the Mayor and Burgesses of Birmingham. The Mayor handed the address to the Duke, and presented each of the Aldermen and Town Councillors. His Royal Highness replied to the address in a speech which was loudly applauded throughout

Lord Hatherton then presented an address from the Midland Institute, of which his Lordship is president. Mr. J. D. Goodman next presented an address from the Small Arms Trade; Mr. P. H. Hollins from the Birmingham Society of Arts; and the Rev. D. Badham from the Proprietary School. Mr. F. Jeaffreson then presented the Duke with a copy of the programme of the last musical festival; and the National Anthem was sung. His Royal Highness was then conducted to the Mayor's carriage; the nobility, gentry, and members of the Corporation repaired to their carriages, and a procession was formed to the park. The streets and houses were crowded with spectators; and the public buildings and several of the houses were decorated with flags, evergreens, and flowers, and mottoes of welcome. Several triumphal arches were thrown across the route, and at the entrance of the park was a fine arch inscribed "For the People."

Calthorpe Park is situated on the Pershore-road, about a mile from New-street. On the procession approaching a salute of twenty-one guns was fired by the Royal Artillery of the Worcestershire Yeomanry. The procession having entered the park, and the Duke of Cambridge, attended by his secretary, the Mayor, and town clerk, having retired for a short time to the pavilion, his Royal Highness then walked, with the Mayor, Town Clerk, and Lord Calthorpe, to the mound in the park, where three shrubs of the Cedrus deodara species were to be planted pro formâ by his Royal Highness, Lord Calthorpe, and the Mayor. The Duke mounted the knoll made for the reception of the tree, received from the Mayor a spade prepared for the occasion, and cast three or four spadefuls of earth upon the plant in the centre. This act was hailed with immense plaudits. The company then formed a circle round the next knoll, and Lord Calthorpe mounted, as his Royal Highness had done, received the same spade from Alderman Palmer, and repeated the process of scattering a little earth over the already-fixed Cedrus. Applause followed; as did also the like formality performed by the Mayor, to whom the spade was handed by the loyal Duke. The ceremony of inauguration being thus completed, his Royal Highness exclaimed in a loud voice, "With the permission of the Mayor I have the honour of stating that the park is now opened to the people." This announcement was responded to by enthusiastic cheers. His Royal Highness and the company with him then retired as expeditiously as they could, greeted with loud plaudits. His Royal Highness and suite proceeded with the Mayor to the Mayor's residence, at Wyddrington. It is computed that at one time there could not have been less than 100,000 persons assembled in the park and its vicinity.

The liberality of Lord Calthorpe and the Mayor, combined with the popularity of the Duke and the fine weather, rendered the festival one of the most successful demonstrations ever held in Birmingham.

In the evening the event was celebrated by a splendid banquet at Dee's Hotel. The large room was tastefully decorated for the occasion with banners, sculptured arms, portraits of the Queen, the late Duke of Cambridge, and the present Duke. The Mayor took the chair. He was supported on the right by the Duke of Cambridge, Lord Leigh, the Earl of Hardwicke, Lord Calthorpe, and Viscount Ingestre; and on the left by the Bishop of Worcester, the Earl of Shaftesbury, Earl Talbot, the Earl of Lichfield, and Lord Hatherton. The banquet was served in the first style, and a variety of toasts were drunk. The Mayor proposed "The health of the Duke of Cambridge," for which his Royal Highness returned thanks in a speech. The Duke of Cambridge subsequently proposed "The health of the Mayor, and prosperity to the great and important town of Birmingham;" his Royal Highness gracefully referring to the liberality and great honour with which the Mayor presided. The Mayor, in returning thanks, spoke of the inauguration of Calthorpe Park afford ing pleasure and gratification to thousands, and to himself deep enjoyment. His Worship concluded by thanking the Duke for the great honour he had conferred upon him (Mr. Ratcliffe) and his native town by the distinguished share his Royal Highness had taken in the day's proceedings.

The concluding toast was "The health of Lord Calthorpe," proposed by Mr. Schofield, M.P., eulogising his Lordship's liberality, which he had that day consummated by the gift of the park. It had been called an experiment, but he had no doubt the people of Birmingham would show they were deserving of the kindness (Loud cheers).

Lord Calthorpe, in acknowledging the toast, stated that his own property in the neighbourhood of Birmingham had been very much enhanced in value by the extension of manufactures, and the consequent rapid spread of the town; and he, therefore, thought he could not make a better endowment for the benefit of the working classes of Birmingham than by affording them the means of healthful recreation in the open air (Cheers). In conclusion his Lordship adverted to the presence of the Duke of Cambridge as proving the sympathy felt by Royalty with the people, expressing his cordial thanks to his Royal Highness for honouring the proceedings of the day by his countenance (Loud cheers).

The Duke of Cambridge passed the night at Wyddrington House, the residence of the Mayor; and in the morning breakfasted with the Mayor and Mrs. Ratcliff and a number of the nobility and members of Parliament. On leaving many of the Royal Highness made a tour of the manufactories in Birmingham; and, after luncheon at Dee's Hotel, the Duke departed by the Great Western Railway for London. A deputation was then served at the Royal Hotel; after which the Earl of Lichfield, Mayor, and Sheriff of the Mayor, and spoke in high terms of his Worship's invitation, and the magnificent reception of the Duke of Cambridge. The event was commemorated by various festivities in the town, among which were a free concert at the Townhall, and a free ball at the Music Hall; and refreshments of 2700 military and police; the entire expenses of which were defrayed by John Ratcliff, Esq., the Mayor.

THE ROYAL BRITISH BANK.—GOVERNMENT PROSECUTION OF THE DIRECTORS.—The offer of a reward of £500 for the apprehension of Mr Humphrey Brown is the first public evidence which has been afforded of the intention of the Government to bring to justice the managers and directors of the late Royal British Bank. On Tuesday last bench warrants were issued by the Court of Queen's Bench, on informations filed by the Attorney-General, not merely for the apprehension of Mr. Humphrey Brown, but for the late governor, deputy-governor, and a number of directors of the bank, several of whom have been already arrested. In the case of Mr. Owen, the first director captured, bail was tendered, and by direction of Mr. Justice Erle he was discharged on his own recognizances of £4000, and two sureties of £2000 each. A similar bail will, it is understood, be accepted in the case of the other directors. Two or three of the persons implicated, it is believed, are in Paris, but if not already in the hands of the officers, at least so completely under their surveillance that escape is altogether impossible. With respect to the late manager of the bank, Mr. Cardoza, there is reason to believe that, like a number of already been, he will shortly be, arrested at Paris by the French police on a charge of travelling with a false passport, and when that charge is disposed of he will of course be available for the warrant issued by the Queen's Bench. The prosecution will be conducted by the Attorney-General, assisted by Mr. Edwin James, Q.C.; and so great has been the dispatch in the preparation and the getting up of the case, that the whole of the briefs, occupying many hundred pages of printed matter, have for some days past been ready for delivery. The indictments will, it is understood, exceed in length those of the famous Irish State trials. Messrs. Lumbister and Hackwood, the able solicitors of the assignees of the bank, will act as solicitors for the prosecution.

THE [illegible] (No), screw steam-vessel, received the first portion of the Atlantic telegraph cable on Tuesday.

COUNTRY NEWS.

COLONEL HERBERT, the new Chief Secretary for Ireland, has been re-elected for Kerry without opposition.

THE Lord Lieutenancy of the county of Tipperary, vacated by the death of Lord Lismore, has been conferred upon his son, the present Viscount.

THE sales last week in the Encumbered Estates Court realised £38,000. The amount of rental posted for sale in the month of June is £18,263 per annum, the acreage being 23,000. The two largest properties are those of Sir Edmund Hayes, M.P., in the county of Donegal (£6000 a year, on the 12th of June, and of George Lane Fox, in Waterford, on the 26th. After the 30th of July, and until the end of November, there will be no further sales in the Encumbered Estates Court.

REVIEW AND SHAM FIGHT.—A military review and sham fight on a scale we but extensive scale took place on Saturday last, on Arthur's Seat, near Edinburgh, the troops being two companies of Royal Artillery, the 5th Dragoon Guards, and the 34th Regiment. The reviewing General was Viscount Melville, commanding the forces in North Britain. The troops were put through a series of operations, and the General expressed his high satisfaction at the manner in which they had conducted themselves. The weather being very beautiful, the spectacle attracted an assemblage of about 30,000 persons.

MUNIFICENT TESTIMONIAL BY THE LIVERPOOL SHIPOWNERS.—On Tuesday, in the Underwriters' Room (the chair being occupied by Mr. James Atkin), the sum of £1000 was presented to Mr. J. T. Towson, scientific examiner and secretary to the local marine board, in consideration of his valuable services in the development of the principle of the great circle sailing, by which the Australian voyages in particular have been so considerably shortened in time. Several felicitous speeches were made on the occasion.

EXPERIMENTS ON THE EXTRACTION OF GOLD.—The richness of American quartz and the mode of operating upon it were tested on Saturday at the works of the Chanellorsville Company, near Frodsham, in Cheshire. The operation was conducted in the presence of the assayer of the Mint, the assayer to the Bank of England, Professor Henry, and a large number of gentlemen of scientific standing. After passing through crushing process, these gentlemen proceeded to watch the mode of extraction of the gold. This is done at these works by the chemical process of amalgamation with quicksilver. The quartz is dried in a kiln, then crushed and takes up the gold from the matter. On its passage into the retort the matter is subjected to magnetic action, for the purpose of taking up the iron. The result of the trial on Saturday was to produce one ton seven penny weights seven grains of gold from the ton of materials—a large and profitable return. The quartz operated upon comes from Virginia, in the neighbourhood of the Appalachians. This soil has long been known for its aureal wealth; but the difficulties of labour and fuel prevented it being worked on the spot, and the estate was purchased by the company.

THE FIFTH GENERATION.—The living ancestry of a child recently born at Huddersfield goes back to the fifth generation. He has a mother, grandmother, two great grandfathers, two great grandmothers, one great great grandfather, and one great great grandmother, all living at the present time and in good health. The great great grandfather, who lives eight miles from Huddersfield, seldom fails coming to the market every Tuesday.

THE MAINE LIQUOR LAW.—A conference of ministers of religion from various parts of the country assembled on Tuesday, at the Townhall, Manchester, to devise measures for aiding the Maine Liquor-law movement. The sittings are to continue for several days and are to be followed by a public meeting at the Free-trade Hall on Thursday evening. The conference was attended by 300 persons.

DISTRESS AMONG THE LABOURING CLASSES IN IRELAND.—Meetings have been held at Dublin, Clonmel, and elsewhere to take into consideration the wretched condition of the working classes, and to devise means for their relief. Much interesting information has been elicited on the generally prosperous state of the country; and even the destitution of the industrial population is attributed not so much to the actual want of employment, as to the unusually high price of provisions. At the Dublin meeting a committee was appointed to obtain, if possible, the balance of the Relief Fund of 1847, now in the hands of trustees, and to apply it for the relief of the destitute poor.

CONVICTION FOR SELLING RETURN TICKETS.—At the Brighton Borough Sessions, on Monday, two persons, Alfred Joseph Knott and Edward Temple, were charged with having sold return tickets of the Brighton Railway Company for 3s. 6d. each. Both defendants were found guilty. One of them was sentenced to be imprisoned six weeks, the other one month.

FORTUNATE ESCAPE.—The Clonmel Chronicle records the following remarkable escape:—On Saturday last, as a gentleman was riding a spirited young horse near the bridge of Newcastle, a furious dog rushed out and bit the horse. The animal became unmanageable, and plunged over the parapet of the bridge and was killed. The gentleman had a fishing-rod in his hand, and was totally unable to restrain the horse; but fortunately, having clung to the saddle, escaped unhurt, although precipitated to the depth of nearly twenty feet.

MANSLAUGHTER.—An inquest recently held at St. Botolph's, on the death of Edward Parker, a labourer employed at the County Lunatic Asylum, resulted in the apprehension of one Richardson, on the charge of manslaughter. The circumstances of his death, as they came out in evidence were briefly these: At a public-house Parker was attempting some practical joke upon Richardson, when the wife of the latter stepped across the room, and, putting her hand on Parker's shoulder, said, "Now, my good man, you had better leave my husband alone; I see you have been wanting to join issue with him, and I'll be bound he is not the man here; and I wish I was a man for your sake;" and thereupon the husband turned round and struck one blow at Parker, who fell across the knees of his neighbour on the other side, by them for a few seconds as if to avoid a repetition of the blow, and was lifted up quite dead.

TRIAL AND CONVICTION FOR FORGERY.—At the High Court of Justiciary, Edinburgh, on Monday, Joseph Manning Wilson, lately a merchant in Leith, was charged with forging and uttering six forged bills of exchange to the amount in all of £2345 18s. 4d. The prisoner was also accused of having uttered all the bills at the office of the National Bank, Leith, and having had the same discounted. After a trial of eight hours' the jury brought in a verdict of "Guilty," and the prisoner was sentenced to transportation for the period of his natural life.

FATAL RAILWAY ACCIDENT NEAR BRADFORD.—An explate layer, named Bower, aged sixty-two, met with his death on the following his occupation on the line of the Leeds, Bradford, and Halifax Junction Railway, between the gauges (in the "six feet"), he suddenly found a train from Leeds to Manchester, and another from Manchester to Leeds, approaching in contrary directions, and within a very short distance of the p ace where he was. He had been observed by the engine-drivers, who had both pulled their whistles lustily drew himself in between the utmost possible efforts to slacken the speed of their respective trains. It was in vain, however. The old man appeared to be paralysed by the sudden discovery of danger, and, as he lastily drew himself in between one side, the engine of the Bradford train struck him on the head and side, and dashed him forward a distance of eighteen yards, the engine and train then passing over him. The body was afterwards found lying in a shockingly-mutilated condition, the head lying torn and bent beneath his shoulders. An inquest was held on the body, and a verdict of "Accidental death" was returned.

SINGULAR ASSAULT.—A case of assault of an extraordinary character was heard before the magistrates of Birmingham on Saturday last. The complainant was Mr. T. R. T. Hodgson, solicitor, and last year Mayor of the borough. Mr. Collis was proceeded against by Mr. Hodgson for the assault. The circumstances are briefly these:—A misunderstanding arose between the parties in consequence of something which took place at a recent entertainment given by the Mayor, after his worship had left his guests, and at which both the plaintiff and defendant were present. The latter wrote to Mr. Hodgson for an explanation, and, considering the reply unsatisfactory, Mr. Collis, on Thursday morning, at about two o'clock, called at Mr. Hodgson's office. He was at once admitted to that gentleman's room, no other person being present. Mr. Collis asked Mr. Hodgson to withdraw his letter; and was proceeded for Mr. Hodgson, who says that it stated facts only, and contained nothing offensive; thereupon Mr. Collis, who is a tall and powerful man, instantly struck Mr. Hodgson several violent blows on the head and face. His cries for assistance were heard; the clerks in the office below and a gentleman passing ran up stairs, the door was burst open, and Mr. Hodgson was found in a state of great exhaustion, bleeding from the nose and mouth, and partially insensible. Mr. Collis quietly walked out of the office, and to somebody about to approach him he said, "I'm a dangerous man; keep off, or I'll lay you flat!" Medical aid was procured for Mr. Hodgson, who was taken home, his nervous system very much shaken. Mr. Collis made a statement to the bench, in the course of which he admitted the assault; that he had struck Mr. Hodgson about three times—once on the side of the head, and afterwards "right and left." He expressed regret that he had resorted to so unjustifiable a proceeding; but the said; before he gave the first blow Mr. Hodgson had seized the tongs, and was brandishing them over his head. This assertion is, however, contradicted by Mr. Hodgson's information upon oath. The magistrates have sent the case to the sessions.

OUTBREAK OF THE SMALLPOX.—This scourge has broken out with considerable severity at Britonferry and Aberavon, in Glamorganshire, where it has shown itself with such virulence as to induce a house-to-house visitation. The Neath board of guardians have urged the necessity of an immediate recourse to vaccination, and have written to the principal inhabitants saying them to take prompt remedial measures. The outbreak has been most severe at Britonferry.

RELIGIOUS SERVICES AT A FAIR.—At the annual Sheffield fair, last week, religious services were conducted in the open air by clergymen of the Church of England, Dissenting ministers, and the town missionary, and attracted large and attentive audiences. The Mayor, Mr. J. W. Pye-Smith, countenanced the proceedings by his presence. About 25,000 tracts were distributed in the fair and its approaches by members of the Sheffield Young Men's Christian Association.

THE Bread and Flour Company of Plymouth, established recently under the new Limited Liability Act, is being wound up; and the official liquidator has found it necessary to make a call of £4 per share as a first instalment, to discharge the liabilities incurred.

AT the Police Court at Liverpool, on Tuesday, John Shattock, an attorney-at-law, was brought before J. S. Mansfield, Esq., stipendiary magistrate, charged with having committed forgery on several bills of exchange. Various gentlemen appeared for the different persons interested, and, by mutual consent, a remand was granted for seven days.

SUDDEN DEATH.—On Saturday night last, just before one o'clock, a man named Preston reached the Manchester, a man fell from the roof and was much injured. On arriving at the office a woman, who was inside, was asked to give her name, that she might be called as a witness, and she was approaching the bookkeeper for the purpose, when she fell down dead.

The great flower show at the King's Rooms, Southsea, took place on Tuesday. There was a magnificent display of American plants, and contributions from generally of the rarest specimens from the gardens of the resident gentry. The beautiful band of the 23rd (Royal Welsh Fusiliers was in attendance.

ON Tuesday a sad accident happened on board the Colossus screw-ship, in Sheerness harbour. Mr. S. Russell was below, and by some accident fell into the spirit room. On being taken up it was found he had sustained most severe injuries, from the effects of which he died the following morning.

AN adjourned inquest was held before the borough coroner of Liverpool on Tuesday regarding the death of a child of Mr. Sillar, of Shaw street, under circumstances involving a charge of negligence against an assistant to a chemist and druggist, in introducing morphia in a prescription instead of powdered sugar. From the effects of which the child died. The jury, after a lengthened inquiry, found a verdict of "Chance medley."

THE CASE OF THOMAS FULLER BACON.—It has been arranged that the trial of Thomas Fuller Bacon, who stands committed for the wilful murder of his mother by poison, at Stamford, shall take place in London, under the Act of Lord Campbell, which was passed with especial reference to the murder of William Palmer. The alleged murder of his mother has created so strong a feeling of excitement in the neighbourhood of Stamford, and the case has been commented on with such severity by the local press, that it is for the ends of justice that the trial shall take place at the Central Criminal Court in London. The session commences on Monday next; but, as it is always understood that the June session shall be made as short as possible for the convenience of the Judges going circuit, the trial will not take place until after their Lordships' return from the country—probably not until the August session, when a special day will be appointed.

The range of temperature during the week was 35.4 deg.

Rain was falling at five p.m. of the 6th, and several peals of thunder were heard at the same time. A considerable quantity fell during the evening and night, and it was raining heavily and continuously during the morning and forenoon of the following day. It was again raining heavily on the night of the 8th. Thunder was heard on the afternoon of June 10, but no lightning seen. The wind was blowing freshly from the north-west on the night of the 7th, and was very high during the following day.

The sky has been much overcast during the nights, but the weather has been generally fine and clear during the days. A faint halo was visible round the moon on the night of the 7th.

TOWN AND TABLE TALK ON LITERATURE, ART, &c.

ON Monday next will be laid in Norwood Cemetery all that is mortal of one of the finest intellects at once original and rare—that England, rich in intellectual men, has ever produced. Douglas Jerrold died on Monday last; and on Monday next some of his many friends, and not a few of his many admirers, will say "hail and farewell" to their celebrated friend.

Jerrold as an author will not easily be forgotten. His services to literature have been many and important. He thought deeply and vigorously, and always expressed, in Saxon English, what he felt. He read mankind, not through the spectacles of books alone, but in the book of Nature, ever open. He has taken, and will retain, an eminent position in the Temple of Fame as a dramatist, as an essayist, and as a novelist. His dramas are not mere closet pieces: they are part of our acting drama; and, so long as actors can be found to continue a stage existence to his plays, so long will the well-conceived and sustained stories of "The Housekeeper," "The Rent Day," "Nell Gwynne," and "The Prisoner of War," draw large houses and applauding hands.

His works, as at present collected, fill eight handsomely-printed volumes. What a world of wise observation, of wit, of rare English humour, and thoroughly English feeling those eight volumes contain! And yet we are inclined to think he is even greater out of his collected works. Some of his thousand and one contributions to Punch and to his own newspaper (Lloyd's) exhibit admirable specimens of his mind in few and those the fittest—words. A supplemental volume should at once be added. This is a duty which his children should see to, for their own and for the public advantage.

Great as Jerrold unquestionably is in his books, he was still greater in conversation. He was the best repartee-man that we have ever encountered. He had the nimblest and happiest wit that we have ever known. He not only said what was natural and new, but said it in a new way. No one had a chance with him. He was, indeed, a bold man who entered into a wit combat with Jerrold. The aptness of his illustrations and the happiness of his metaphors were not to be matched. He was not only armed to reply at once, and once for all, to whatever his adversary had to advance, but he so penetrated into the minds of his opponents that he seized what they were about to say, and replied (strange as it may seem) to the very argument or point of illustration which they were about to advance. He could put his ideas at once logically and humorously to the logician was convinced and the humourist was delighted. We have seen him momentarily paralysed, but seldom vanquished. What he was wont to call negative wit tried him the most. But he enjoyed this kind of wit, with the hearty laugh, and the thrust of the right hand through his fine head of hair, which usually preceded his own happiest sayings. So quick was he in seeing and forestalling, that he laughed (no one heartier) at his own jokes, and gave the key-note of admiration that was always taken up.

Certain events coloured his life. His birth and residence in London made him a Londoner—his father's profession as the manager o a theatre made him a dramatist—his early life at sea gave the true sailor-like quality to his nautical sayings—his occupation as a printer first made him an author—and the tardy recognition of his attainments a sarcastic, not a sour or a savage, man. There was yet another phase in his condition that made him what he was—the first dinner and supper table wit of his time:—a foolish fear of his clever, sarcastic, and yet kindly, tongue. The clubs of London were, or seemed to be, afraid of him. The very proposition to admit him as a member was (until the last month) met with "O, that will never do!" His companionable and genial nature was turned in this way from large and established clubs to circles of his own creation, where he was always welcome, and when absent always missed with regret. Many of his happiest sayings were overheard and remembered by strangers; for he would say a kindly thing in a loud tone, and a sarcastic thing in a lowly one. And this was felt only last month, when he was admitted a member of the Reform and was on the eve of admission to other Clubs.

His sayings deserve collection, and will doubtless find some one of his many friends to bring them together. Of those he was most intimate with, he has said something sarcastic that caused a laugh and stuck; of all he has said something appropriately kind; and both are not forgotten. They should be taken together. No man wounded more readily, or healed the wound he made more promptly or cleverly. To no man could a tale of distress be told with a better result. His hand was ever in his pocket to give, and he gave much beyond his means of giving.

We were present at a dinner only last year at which the fame of Jerrold as a wit was the subject of conversation. Each man undertook to illustrate in succession the particular faculty of Jerrold's mind of saying things not to be forgotten for their special and appropriate wit. And what fine things were recalled to memory in that delightful half hour with their then living friend! The last repeated seemed always the best, and all were good; for his was Covent-garden wit (no narrow locality)—the wit of Wycherley, Congreve, Vanbrugh, and Farquhar. He played with words, and yet was not a punster; it was unnecessary for him to pun; he understood the English language, and turned it to higher account.

In this character of a rarely gifted man we are only collecting and repeating the talk of the week in literary and Covent-garden circles. Jerrold would have shone at the Mermaid and the Apollo, at Will's and White's, just as he shone at the old Museum and the Hooks and Eyes. This fine faculty of wit remained with him to the last—his mind was the last to die. One word more. Those whose heads are in the least touched with grey have no chance of meeting with another Douglas Jerrold:—

A lang's or poet's birth doth ask an age.

THE "LANCASHIRE WITCHES."—A "foreign traveller" concludes a letter on the Manchester Exhibition with saying: "At none of the London shows did it ever happen to me to see so many good-looking ladies, and young ladies, as are to be found charming away the attention of the amateur from the mere semblance to the substance of beauty. Nature and art have joined hands at Trafford, and any discreet man may enjoy the advantage of seeing, comparing, and judging between the positive and the fictitious. For myself, I am ready to back flesh and blood against the thickest coat of oil-colour and the smoothest canvas. Those dames and damsels belong to the old brood of Lancashire witches, and bear in their eyes sparks of heat that they consumed their great grandmothers at the stake. They gave me a pretty peep at the Gunpowder Plot when you seated on the central settees, with calm, serene, wide-open eyes, and lips apart, they gazed at you or at the Nereids just above your heads leisurely, calmly, steadily, like Horseses taking their rest, as Dante has it, and the glamour of those lustrous orbs, the subtle flame they breathe through those rubies, pass through and through you, till pictures, statues, and knights in armour, and glass roof and all, swim about you, and you drop exhausted and dizzy on the same settee by the side of the dangerous enchantress. Here are subjects for old and young masters: plenty of nature to quicken the enthusiasm of the future worshipper of art."

THE GRAND DUKE CONSTANTINE.—The Grand Duke arrived at the Hague on the 3rd inst. A gala dinner took place in the evening in honour of his visit. Covers were laid for eighty. All the members of the Royal family, the persons of the suite of the Prince, and the Ministers and members of the diplomatic body were present. On the 4th the Grand Duke left by a special train for Hanover, which he reached on the 5th, and immediately repaired to the Palace.

MUSIC.

THE lovers of Mozart have been gratified this week by the production of his masterpiece, "Don Giovanni," at both the Italian theatres—at the Lyceum on Tuesday, and at Her Majesty's Theatre on Thursday. The performance at the LYCEUM was excellent, but presented no novel feature. The most remarkable circumstance in attending it was the resumption by Grisi of her great part of Donna Anna, which she resigned last year to a very inferior performer. But Grisi this season has gained new life and energy. She is not the Grisi of two or three seasons back, betraying symptoms of decay, and contemplating abandonment of the stage, but the Grisi of a dozen years ago, in all the pride and strength of womanhood, and asserting her supremacy as the "Queen of Song." In the character of Donna Anna she is, without disparagement to any of her compeers, as unrivalled as ever. She never exerted herself more earnestly, or with greater effect, than on Tuesday night—singing charmingly, and acting with the power of a great tragedian. We cannot say as much for the performance of Mario, in Don Ottavio. He was not in good voice; and his great air, "Il mio tesoro," which he used to sing so exquisitely, passed off without the usual encore. Bonconi is very ill advised in persisting, notwithstanding previous failure, to play the part of Don Giovanni, for which he has not a single requisite either of person, manner, or voice. It is surprising that a person of his intelligence should be so blind to his own defects, and to the coldness with which his attempts at this part have always been received. He now succeeded no better, and had no better reception, than before. Bosio was a most captivating Zerlina. Her personation of the rustic coquette was perfection, and her singing was beautiful, and would have been better still had she not departed now and then from the simplicity of the text, and introduced some fioriture which in Mozart's music are quite out of place. The merits of Formes's Leporello are well known. His reading and that of Lablache are totally opposed to each other. He eschews everything humorous and funny. His Leporello is a sharp, satirical rogue, with every disposition to be as great a villain as his master. And his terrors during the diabolical catastrophe, in place of being laughable, really heighten the horror of the scene. The piece, in its ensemble, was got up as it has usually been at the Royal Italian Opera, and the performance was much applauded by a crowded audience.

AT HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE great pains have been taken to give both novelty and completeness to the performance. The cast, of course, is new, all the performers appearing for the first time in London in their respective parts. Benevenano is the Don Giovanni, Belletti the Leporello, Giuglini the Ottavio, Spezia the Donna Anna, Catalani the Donna Elvira, Ricolomini the Zerlina, and Corsi the Masetto. In the mise en scène an unprecedented degree of attention has been paid to the sense of the drama, which is generally made confused and obscure by want of care in the choice of scenery and decorations. The consequence is that the plot and incidents are more clearly brought out and developed than they have ever been before, in our experience at least, of the performance of this opera; and this clearness, we need scarcely add, enhances immeasurably the interest of this very powerful drama. For example, the absurdity of making the action commence by Donna Anna and Don Giovanni rushing together into the public street is got rid of by laying the scene in a retired garden of the Commendatore's palace, where it is quite natural that the incidents should happen. In like manner the meaning of the celebrated piece of concerted music, "Sola, sola, in buojo loco," hitherto unintelligible, is rendered clear by being placed in an appropriate locality, to which the various personages are naturally brought. There are other instances of a similar kind; and the scenery is not only defined, but exceedingly beautiful and picturesque. The rural sport, with Don Giovanni's palace in the background, in which Zerlina and her rustic companions are dancing when the seigneur and his valet come among them, is one of the sweetest landscapes imaginable; and the grand hall in the palace, splendidly illuminated and filled with festive groups of masks and dancers, is one of the most gay and brilliant spectacles we have ever seen on the Opera stage. Great care, too, was taken in paying due homage to Mozart by a complete performance of the music. Several airs of great importance, which, from the indolence of performers or other cause, have been generally omitted, are now restored. Among them are Donna Anna's brilliant air, "Non mi dir," which Grisi leaves out, because it is too florid for her voice; Ottavio's "Della sua pace," a masterpiece of beauty and expression, which Mario has never sung; Elvira's "Mi tradi," noble, terrific, and original air, which very few of our Elviras have been able to sing; and Masetto's "Ho capito," which our Masettos have never sung, though it is highly dramatic. All these things give a fulness to the performance most satisfactory to all who love the music of Mozart. The performance of Thursday night was brilliantly successful, and will ensure many repetitions of the opera. At present we cannot enter into critical details; but we may do the musicians say that the performers acquitted themselves admirably: that Piccolomini and Giuglini gathered fresh laurels; that Spezia sustained the part of Donna Anna with great power; that Belletti a Leporello was excellent in every respect; that Benevenano, on whom devolved the hard part of Don Giovanni we have seen; and that Ortolani was the very best Donna Elvira we have ever seen. The house was crowded to overflowing.

THE principal CONCERT of the week was Mr. Benedict's, in Her Majesty's Theatre, on Wednesday morning. He was assisted by the whole strength of the establishment, including Piccolomini, Alboni, Giuglini, Belletti, and others; and he had, moreover, several eminent instrumentalists, especially Herr Ernst and Mdme. Schumann. The programme, as might be expected from the giver, presented a bill of fare both ample and recherché. Another Concert of note was Mdme. Puzzi's, at the Hanover-square Rooms, on Monday morning. There was a host of vocal and instrumental talent, and the concert was highly gratifying to one of the most numerous and fashionable assemblages of the season.

WILLIS'S ROOMS.—On Saturday Signor Nappi presented his patrons with a concert, which was numerously and fashionably attended. Mdmes. Ianeford, Frodsl, and Perretti, contributed much to the success of the entertainment, which was marked by the display of the selection and the uniform merit of the different artistes engaged. M. Guglio Regondi was very successful with the concertina and guitar; and Signor Li Calsi, as conductor, deserves high commendation.

THE THEATRES, &c.

LYCEUM.—Madame Ristori commenced her second engagement at this theatre on Monday, and judiciously reappeared in the character of Medea. We dilated last year so fully on the merits of this great actress, and entered so largely into the critical points of M. Legouvé's drama, that to pursue the subject minutely on the present occasion were inexpedient. There is, however, so much in the broad sweep and scope of the fact itself, as a theatrical event, that a few words of self gratulation as well as of welcome may be fairly demanded. So rare are the opportunities of the English public to witness the grand and classical in style, and so little encouragement is given to the poetic drama in general, that the appearance among us of Madame Ristori may be justly accepted as an historic challenge—nay, as the assertion of a literary claim, and the response it may meet with acquires accordingly a peculiar interest. Madame Ristori was received by a highly fashionable audience with no less enthusiasm and enjoyment than that which she experienced on her original debut. The part of Medea is one which presents abundant opportunities for the display of her genius; and the tragedy which it illustrates is doubtless a work of great merit. We do not, in this respect, implicitly accept the verdict which was tendered to a critical investigation of the work of M. Legouvé. This, perhaps was partly due to the rejection of it by Madame Rachel: but, since Madame Ristori has demonstrated that the work is capable of supporting a public sensation, surely the fact should relieve some credit on its author. We have had occasion lately to study the Italian version of "Medea" minutely, and have discovered in it numberless beauties that may escape a cursory perusal. The dramatist has not attempted a purely classical production, but added to the treatment of the antique argument as much of a romantic colouring as possible. He has, in fact, made an interesting and effective melodrama of it, dwelling more on the domestic incidents than on its heroic value. In this way he has rendered the situation of Medea very pathetic, and given to her some exceedingly touching passages. Nay, he has contrived within the limits of a single character to include the entire scale of passion. One defect, however, it has, and it is a serious one, and sufficient of itself to justify Rachel's rejection. He has deprived Medea of all claim to being an enchantress; he has plucked from her the magic robe, and presents her only as a wand-ring outcast, seeking charity and a husband. Here an element of grandeur is omitted, which might have been advantageously supplied.

On Wednesday Alfieri's tragedy of "Rosmunda" was repeated a Leonine of terrible energy, and acted by Ristori with marvellous power.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

ASCOT RACES.

THE first day at Ascot, albeit the Vase sank down to three entries, was full of interest. Old Kerry Bird gave about five stone, and disposed of a whole host of feathers over the New Mile; and Sydney, also ridden by David Hughes, who is, we believe, to ride for Baron Rothschild in future, (though it is said that he declined to form a regular engagement), pleased his owner in the Ascot Derby at last. The Ascot Stakes brought out a wretched lot, and was won by Claude Lorraine, who was scarcely backed for a shilling by his party; Emigrant, the winner of the Liverpool Steeplechase, running in sixth. The Gold Vase was a surprise, as Arsenal, one of the most racing-like horses out, and with quarters and thighs especially adapted for the Ascot hill, made very short work of the favourite, Strathnaver, whom he caught him half way up the hill. The former made the running, which was only slow throughout; Mary lying last from start to finish, with not a shoot of a chance. After the race Arsenal was much fancied at 20 to 1 for the St. Leger, which seems likely to be a great betting race, in spite of Blink Bonny. The closest contest of the meeting was that between Aleppo and Pitapat, for the Triennial, which was won by a "short head;" and Clydesdale, who from his splendid look seems likely to retrieve "Mr. Howard's" Derby losses (not nearly so great, by-the-by, as have been represented), was a very clever winner in the Biennial. He is by Annandale, out of The Baldy; and is in the Two Thousand, Derby, and St. Leger. He was bred by Mr. Eyke, the owner of Sweetmeat, who has his half-sister, Allspice, by the latter horse. Lord Derby was second with Woodnymph, a grey filly by his Longbow. Wednesday brought about a meeting between Ayesmores and Beechnut, the two high-priced yearlings of the great Burleigh sale, and his Lordship won with the one he retained. Rosa Bonheur—whose form, like Beechnut's, was supposed to be gone—won the Hunt Cup; and Sydney, who seems likely to find friends for the St. Leger, scored another victory in the Windsor Castle Stakes.

THURSDAY.—THE CUP DAY.—The fineness of the weather and the facilities of the railway traffic attracted a greater attendance to the Heath than had ever been brought together on any previous year. Her Majesty, according to custom, honoured the national sport with her presence. She arrived shortly after half-past one o'clock, accompanied by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, Prince Alfred, the Princess Royal, the Princess Alice, the Duke of Cambridge, the Duchess of Cambridge, and the Princess Mary, besides the young Prince of Prussia, the intended husband of the Princess Royal. As the Royal cortège, which consisted of eight carriages, passed up the course her Majesty and the Royal party received the hearty congratulations of the assembled multitudes; which were again renewed when they appeared in the centre of the Royal stand, after the race for the Cup. The race for the Cup was contested by twelve horses, and was won cleverly by Skirmisher, who retrieved the laurels he had lost at the Derby. After the third race the Royal party left in the same order they had arrived, accompanied by similar loyal demonstrations from the thronged course.

The meetings for next week are of no very interesting character, and comprise Hampton, on Wednesday and Thursday; Newton, on Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday; East Dereham, on Wednesday; Robertown, on Thursday; and Edinburgh Spring, on Saturday.

The Royal yearlings will be sold at Tattersall's, on Monday. Seven of them are colts, and nine fillies; and Orlando and Pyrrhus the First are each the sire of five. Among the stock of the former is a half-sister to Voltigeur. A Touchstone colt, out of Trickstress, who was bought for 230 guineas, at Palmer's sale, is among the lot. On Tuesday Mr. Sarsfield, the celebrated Manchester dealer, disposes of all his horses at his place of business there; and on Thursday Messrs. Bretherton bring a lot of Highland ponies to the hammer at Birmingham.

Mr. Goddard, late of the Shropshire, is to hunt Mr. Tailby's hounds, in High Leicestershire, next season; and Boxall (late first whip in that country to old Tom Day, who retires) goes to hunt the Shropshire.

Boating and yachting men are once more fairly afloat on "the pure element." Monday and Tuesday are the days fixed for the Durham regatta; on Tuesday the Leander Club have a random match from Westminster to Putney; on Thursday Helen and May row from Putney to Mortlake for £20 a side; and the Royal London Yacht Club have a first and second class yacht sailing match from Erith to the Nore (light-ship and back. The Oxford University pair-oars race comes off on Friday, as well as the Royal Thames Yacht Club schooner match from Gravesend round the Mouse and back to Greenhithe; while the Royal Mersey Yacht Club regatta is held on Friday and Saturday.

The All England Eleven appear in the provinces for the first time this year on Monday, against twenty-two of the Prince's Park Club, Liverpool; and again on Thursday at Manchester, against twenty of the Broughton Club. The Marylebone Club and ground have two engagements, viz., on Monday, at Lord's, against the county of Sussex; and on Thursday at Oxford against a picked undergraduate eleven; and the club stop at Windsor on their way home to play the present Etonians. At the Oval, also, on Thursday, six gentlemen and five players on each side, from Surrey and Cambridgeshire, meet for their return match.

ASCOT RACES. TUESDAY.

Trial Stakes.—Early Bird, 1. York, 2.
Ascot Derby Stakes.—Sydney, 1. Turbit, 2.
Ascot stakes.—Claude Lorraine, 1. Hedgehog, 2.
Gold Vase. Arsenal, 1. Strathnaver, 2.
First Ascot Biennial Stakes. Clydesdale, 1. Woodnymph, 2.
Seventh Ascot Triennial Stakes.—Aleppo, 1. Pitapat, 2.

Coronation Stakes. Beechnut, 1. Aynsanora, 2.
Windsor Castle Stakes. Sydney, 1. Bright, 2.
Royal Hunt Cup.—Rosa Bonheur, 1. Cotswold, 2.
Handicap Plate.—Amelia, 1. Miss Waters, 2.
Sweepstakes. Lady Albert, 1. Harlwicx, 2.
Fernhill Stakes.—Polly Peachum, 1. Sister to Ellington, 2.

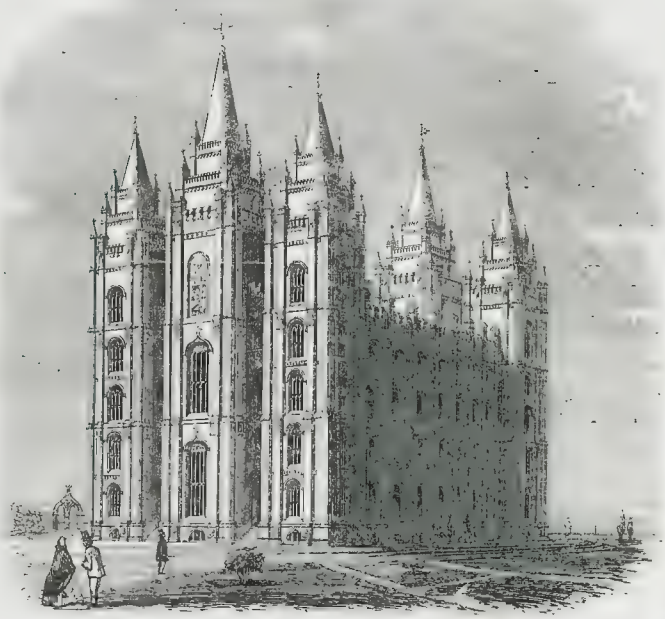
THURSDAY.

Fifty Sovs. Sweepstakes. Blink Bonny walked over.
Handicap Sweepstakes.—Maggie Lauder, 1. Polly Johnson, 2.
Ascot Gold Cup. Skirmisher, 1. Gemma di Vergy, 2.
New Stakes.—Ledbury, 1. Venita, 2.

GRAND REGATTA AT ISLEWORTH.—A grand regatta took place on Monday, at Isleworth, under the immediate patronage of his Grace the Duke of Northumberland, who, with the Duchess, Lord and Lady Monteagle, the Bishop of Durham, Lord and Lady Ravensworth, Lady Constance Grosvenor, and others of the nobility and gentry, honoured the sport with their presence, which was witnessed from the pavilion at Sion Park. Steamers and barges gaily dressed were moored in different parts of the course, and every means had been taken to make the regatta as imposing as possible, but the weather was extremely inauspicious. It was a heavy gale of wind during the morning, and at the time of starting the first race the rain descended thickly, and was followed by heavy showers, but the weather became more agreeable in the evening. The races were well contested.

CRICKET.—ISLINGTON ALBION V. WATFORD.—This match was played on Thursday week, on the ground of the former, at Park-road, Holloway, opposite the Prince Edward; the result being that the Albion won in a single innings, with 45 runs to spare.

MARYLEBONE CLUB AND GROUND V. THE COUNTY OF KENT. This match commenced at Lord's Ground on Monday, was continued on Tuesday, and concluded on Wednesday. There was some splendid playing throughout the match, and the visitors were very numerous to witness it. The match was won by the M.C.C., but by five runs only.



MORMON TEMPLE IN COURSE OF ERECTION IN GREAT SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH TERRITORY, U.S.

MORMON TEMPLE IN SALT LAKE CITY.

THE last accounts from the Great Salt Lake represent matters in that quarter as being most unsettled. Brigham Young was at Great Salt Lake City organising a secret expedition to somewhere in the North, for some purpose unknown to the Gentile world. This fact is corroborated by a despatch from St. Louis. His negotiations with the Chief Pah-Utah for his co-operation in the plans of the expedition fully explain the statement that he had been treating with the Indians for safe conduct out of the country. The deluded people are building in the valley of the Great Salt Lake a Temple, of which we engrave a View, by Frederick Piercy. This temple is the fourth commenced by the Mormons; and is expected to surpass all its predecessors in size and beauty. The last temple, which was built at Nauvoo, was destroyed by fire after the Mormons had left it. The present edifice, however, will be much larger, as as much stone or rock is stated to have been already used in its foundation alone as was used in the whole of the Nauvoo Temple.

The erection of a temple is a part of the creed of the Latter-day Saints; hence in every location of consequence that they have occupied they have always commenced one of these edifices. A temple with this people is not, as some suppose, a place for large assemblies; or this purpose they have large erections, one of which, called the 'Bowery,' in Great Salt Lake City, is capable of holding 12,000 persons. But the temple is used for the performance of religious ordinances only.

This building will occupy nearly the centre of a block of ground forty rods square. Round this block a substantial wall is built, finished on the top with an iron palisading, so as to effectually secure the building against intrusion.

According to a description given by the architect, Mr. T. O. Angell, the walls will be sixteen feet think at their base, standing on footings extending on either side three feet wider still. At the level of eight feet above the ground line they will be about eight feet thick, and continued in proportion.

The building will have six towers—three at each end—symbolical of the two priesthoods (the Melchisedec and the Aronic) by which the Church is governed: the presidency of each consisting of three persons, a president, or head, supported by two counsellors or assistants. The three towers at the principal entrance are higher than those at the other end, figurative of the idea that the Melchisedec priesthood includes within its functions all the power and authority of the other; and thus stands above it in authority and influence.

The whole of the architecture of the building is in the same way made to convey some motto or moral illustrative of the principles of the Latter-day Saints' faith; for instance, on the front of two of the principal towers will be carved in bold or alto-relievo the "great dipper,' or Ursa Major; the pointers ranging as near as possible with the North Star, illustrating the idea, as the architect has it, "that the lost may find themselves by the priesthood."

The edifice will be 186½ feet long from east to west, and 99 feet wide. The whole house will cover 21,850 feet. Around the building will be a promenade, approached on all sides by steps. About the height of the promenade each of the corner towers will be 25 feet square, decreasing somewhat as they ascend. All the ornamental parts will be of wrought stone, and the mass or body of the building of granite.

On the lower part of the front of each of the buttresses will be sculptured a representation of the Earth, so arranged that a person passing round would see her in her various seasons; whilst on the same face, and just below the next string-course, will be found the Moon in her quarter; and at the third string-course the Sun, surrounded by rays of light; the whole surmounted by Saturn with his rings.

This temple, when completed, will be one of the greatest ornaments of the Great Salt Lake City, as it will occupy one of its most commanding positions, and will be seen on approaching the city from all sides. North of it "Ensign Peak" rears its head, on which, every 4th of July, is hoisted the mammoth American flag of the stars and stripes, saluted by the firing of cannon and the cheers of assembled thousands met to do honour to the American Constitution.

Great Salt Lake City is situated on the great highway of the west from the eastern States to the Pacific shores, and must necessarily rise in importance, and share the trade of that vast line of traffic. The city already possesses manufactories of very many kinds, whilst the surrounding counties abound in every description of minerals, especially coal and iron.

The Plate whence the accompanying view has been reduced is published by W. Budge, 35, Jewin-street, Cripplegate.

THE LATE GILBERT ABBOTT A'BECKETT.

SOME months since the remains of the lamented Gilbert à Beckett were removed from their temporary resting-place at Boulogne, and consigned to their last abode in Highgate Cemetery—his literary friends and companions assisting at the sad duty. Since then these gentlemen have caused to be erected a monument to the memory of the magistrate, the man of letters, and the gentleman. The memorial is simple, and in accordance with the character of the deceased, whose premature removal from a world he made the wiser and the more cheerful by his good sense and his genial humour is still most lamented by those who best knew him. We subjoin the inscription on his tomb: it is mainly condensed from the simpler lines that, at the time of his death, appeared in the journal he had from the first enlivened by his wit, and enhanced by his wisdom:—

TO THE MEMORY OF
WHO DIED AT BOULOGNE-SUR-MER, AUGUST 30TH, 1856, AGED 45 YEARS.
ENDOWED WITH A GENIAL, MANLY SPIRIT;
GIFTED WITH SUBTLEST POWERS OF WIT AND HUMOUR,
THEY WERE EVER EXERCISED
TO THE HEALTHIEST AND MOST INNOCENT PURPOSE.
AS A MAGISTRATE
HIS WISE, CALM, HUMANE ADMINISTRATION OF THE LAW PROVED THAT THE FULFILMENT OF THE GRAVEST DUTIES
IS NOT INCOMPATIBLE WITH THE SPORTIVENESS OF LITERARY GENIUS.
"HIS PLACE KNOWS HIM NOT,"
BUT HIS MEMORY IS TENDERLY CHERISHED.

The removal from Boulogne was entrusted to Mr. W. Garston, one of the directors of the Economic Funeral Company, and was effected with the utmost care and delicacy. As a mark of respect to the deceased no charge was made by the company.

THE GREAT SEA SERPENT IN TABLE BAY.

WE copy the following statements, with the Illustration, from two communications which appeared in the Cape Argus of March 14th, 1857.

SIR,—I inclose a letter addressed to me by my friend Dr. Biccard (with a drawing) containing an interesting account of the sea serpent seen by him and others off the old lighthouse at the entrance of Table Bay on the 16th of last month. It savours not a little of presumption to maintain that such a marine monster does exist, in the face of the deliberately-recorded opinion of the greatest living zoologist, Professor Owen, yet I venture to do so upon the simple testimony of my own eyes. In the year 1848, or 9, Mr. G. D. Brunette (of St. George's street, the conveyancer) and myself were fishing at Camp's Bay one bright, clear summer day. There was not a breath of air, and the water was as smooth as the surface of a pond. About midday we were leaving the rocks to proceed to the marine villa, when Mr. Brunette suddenly directed my attention to what he at first thought was a whale. A moment's inspection was sufficient, however, to detect the real nature of the animal. It was about a mile from the shore we saw a line of shining black objects, like a string of large casks, floating on the surface of the water, lying parallel with the shore. It kept gently bobbing up and down, and on one occasion we saw the whole length for a few seconds above the water. Judging from the size of an Indiaman, 1000 tons, at a similar distance, I should say the animal's length was from 150 to 200 ft. Of its girth I can form no estimate; but, from the show it made at so great a distance, it must have been at least three feet above the level of the sea. Nor could we distinguish head from tail, though near one extremity we saw what looked like foam or froth, as though the animal was blowing water in a lateral direction. It seemed to be basking in the warm sun, with no other motion than that I have described, of dipping under occasionally. After watching it for about a quarter of an hour we started for the villa, for the purpose of borrowing a telescope, but we had scarcely walked ten yards when we observed the animal turn slowly round and then make off in a straight line to seawards, towards the N.W. It moved at a rapid rate; so much so that when we got to the house and procured the glass it had reached such a distance that we could not distinguish it better than we had done with our naked eyes while on the rocks. The motion while moving off was undulatory, the cask-like substances submerging and emerging from time to time, and glittering in the sun till we lost sight of them altogether, which was about an hour after first seeing the animal. That this animal was a sea serpent I never had the slightest doubt; yet, knowing the general incredulity on this subject, neither Mr. Brunette nor myself cared much to boast of what we had seen, so we said nothing about it; but, as Dr Biccard has obligingly, at my request, furnished me with particulars, for general information, of the animal seen by him under such favourable circumstances, I am induced to add my own poor testimony to the many facts now on record, proving conclusively the existence of a great marine saurian or some similar animal. I would point out that a gentleman of Dr Biccard's well-known scientific attainments is not likely to mistake a seal for a serpent, and that the six or seven individuals who witnessed the evolutions of the animal at so short a distance as 200 yards could scarcely have been misled by a piece of seaweed, or by a deal.

The narrative of Dr Biccard will be read with interest, and I beg to refer those who feel any interest in it to an article on the Great Sea Serpent in the Westminster Review for January, 1849.

Yours, &c.,
CHAS. A. FAIRBRIDGE.

Cape Town, 13th March, 1857.

Cape Town, 11th March, 1857.

My dear Fairbridge,—According to your wish, I give you a short description of the sea serpent seen by me and others opposite the old lighthouse at Green Point.

On Monday, the 16th of February last, I went out to Green Point in the afternoon. At about 5 p.m., or a little after, I was called by Mr. Murray, the lighthouse-keeper, to "come and see a sea monster." I proceeded to the lighthouse, and from thence I saw on the water, about 150 yards from the shore, the serpent, of which some details have already appeared in print. It was lying in the position shown in the accompanying Sketch No. 1. I borrowed a rifle from Mr Hall (Mr. Murray's father-in-law), and fired at the animal. The ball fell short in front of it by about four yards, as shown in the sketch. The animal did not move, and I then fired a second shot, the ball striking about a foot and a half from it. The serpent, then apparently startled, moved from his position, straightened himself out, and went under water, evidently getting out of the way. He was invisible for about ten minutes, at the expiration of which interval he reappeared at about two hundred yards distance, and I should say about forty yards further off. He then came right on towards the place where I first saw him; but, before arriving there, my son, who had joined me, fired at the animal. Unluckily, the discharge broke the nipple of the rifle, and I was thus prevented from further firing. Upon reaching the place he had first occupied, the serpent formed himself into the position delineated in Sketch No. 2. He then stood right into the bay, and soon afterwards we lost sight of him altogether.

As I have stated, the distance the animal kept from shore was not more than 200 yards; its length was about 200 feet, but its thickness I cannot tell, the upper part of the body only being visible. The head could be seen but indistinctly, as he raised it at intervals, as shown in the sketch. I consider the protuberance to be the upper part of the head, but I could not discover the eyes, notwithstanding the short distance, and the telescope, which was a pretty good one. The colour of the animal was a dark dull colour, except the head, which was maculated with large white spots. The weather at this time was very calm, with a light north-westerly breeze. Besides myself, the serpent was seen by Mr. Hall, Mr. Murray, Mrs and Miss Biccard, my two sons, and my coachman, who all saw it distinctly.

Yours, &c.,
BICCARD.

THE ASCOT RACE PRIZE PLATE.

THE ASCOT CUP.

THE subject is the affecting story of the poor Arab refusing to part with the faithful companion of his desert wanderings. The artist has selected the time when, doubtful of the future treatment of his favourite, the Arab determines to cling to her and poverty rather than subject her to any chance of unkindness, though tempted by the wealth of the Turkish merchant. The ornamentation of this cup is of a purely Oriental character, in which any representation of natural objects is strictly forbidden; but an unlimited play of fancy, and a contrast of varied form, together with the accidental reflection of surrounding objects which this beautiful metal gives in unceasing changes, are characteristic of the magnificence of the Eastern mind.

THE QUEEN'S VASE

is a fine specimen of the times when the massive tankard, enriched with some suitable device, was the most distinguished object on the baronial table. This bold and characteristic piece of plate is conceived and executed in the true spirit of that age when, just emerging from Gothic conventionality into the renaissance, we produced that noble and truly English style which culminated in the Elizabethan, the peculiarities of which are here well displayed, both in form and ornamentation. The crowning group, representing the death of the wild boar, is admirably combined with the composition, and is executed with the characteristic spirit and artistic truth which have been so long peculiar to the house of Garrard. The design is by Mr. S. Cotterill.

THE ROYAL HUNT CUP.

is neither a vase nor an urn, nor even an equestrian group, but a simple candelabrum, which, if not so purely ornamental as the prizes usually set aside for the conquerors in our "Isthmian games," has the merit of being more useful than any; and such seems to have been the idea of the stewards who selected the design.

The "Cup," then, for the Royal Hunt is, as will be seen from our Engraving, a fine candelabrum for five lights, springing from an ornamental base, upon which are three stags, modelled with great care and freedom, and admirably grouped. The base has three shields, one of which bears the Royal Arms; a second the inscription, "Royal Hunt Cup—Ascot—1857;" and a third bears the name of the winner. The shaft of the candelabrum is of arabesque fashion, and from the branches for the lights are pendent flowers and ornaments of a graceful form.

The value of the "Cup" is upwards of £200; it has been produced by Messrs. Hunt and Roskell (late Storr and Mortimer), of 156, New Bond-street, from a design by Mr. Thomas Brown, an artist who has been connected with their house for a considerable period, and who has designed many of the works engraved in these pages.

THE GREAT HANDEL FESTIVAL AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

THIS, the greatest Musical Congress ever assembled, owes its existence to the activity of the Sacred Harmonic Society to promote by their example the commemoration, in 1859, of the Centenary of Handel's death—an event which may well take worthy of the great master, and of the widely-diffused musical knowledge of the present day. In carrying out this object it was found that the Central Transept of the Crystal Palace offered a locale for this display far beyond any other existing building. The space appropriated to the orchestra alone occupies a clear area of 168 feet width by 90 feet depth. We have engraved the plan of the Orchestra upon the preceding page.

The orchestra, which has been constructed in a somewhat flattened curve, rises from the floor at a front elevation of eight feet, and is thence continued in a series of semicircular steps varying from ten to fifteen inches each to a total height of forty seven feet. These rises are thirty-four in number, of which eleven are appropriated to the band, and the remaining twenty-three to the chorus.

Ample space has been given to the orchestra, the violins having 15 square feet, and the double basses and violoncellos 24 square feet for each desk. The chorus are all placed on raised benches, each individual having 21 inches in width by 30 inches in depth. When it is remembered that the usual allowance in churches is only 16 inches for each person, it will be seen that the convenience of the performers has been well attended to.

The balance and disposition of the instrumentalists have received much attention from Mr. Costa. The band consists of 76 first violins, 74 second violins, 50 violas, 50 violoncellos, 50 double basses, 8 flutes, 8 oboes, 8 clarinets, 8 bassoons, 12 horns, 6 trumpets, 6 cornets, 8 ophicleides, 8 serpents, 9 trombones, 2 pair of kettle drums, 1 large long drum, 6 side drums—385 performers in all, who are arranged at 202 desks. The chorus, originally intended to consist of 2000 voices, might exceed that number. The entire orchestra, therefore, is, as near as possible, 2500.

Every seat and stand throughout the orchestra has its appropriate number, and a staff of thirty-eight superintendents, each having from fifty to a hundred performers, under three immediate superiors, will identify and record the attendance of each individual day by day.

In the arrangement of the instruments in the orchestra great care has been taken to give all of each class of instrument a connecting link with each other. The accompanying woodcut comprises 30 violins, 12 violas, 12 violoncellos, and 12 double basses, with the usual wind band

A considerable portion of the reprient wind is arranged in two of the avenues which separate the orchestra from the galleries.

In the centre, between the organ and the band, the large drum made by Mr. Distin for the festival will be a conspicuous object. It is between six and seven feet in diameter, and when gently struck produces a tone resembling the booming of a deep pedal pipe.

The chorus comprises about a thousand metropolitan amateurs, 200 professional chorus, and nearly 850 choristers carefully selected and rehearsed from the great provincial choral societies and the cathedral choirs.

If Exeter Hall were filled lengthwise with a series of semicircular benches towering high above the roof, it would convey but an inadequate idea of the extent of the orchestra, which alone far exceeds the area of any music-hall in the country.

A private trial of the great organ took place on Monday night before Mr Costa: the result was gratifying in the extreme, the gigantic instrument answering to the touch, and as it were "spitting" out the tone with wonderful force. It was stated by the journals not a week since that a powerful blacksmith in the village of Sydenham, a distance of nearly a mile

The interest excited by the festival abroad and in distant parts of the country is very great. Calculations entered into by the committee show that the ticket receipts (already considerably exceeding in amount the entire expenses of the festival) more than three-fourths have been sent out of London, many of the purchasers coming from great distances abroad, or remote districts in this country, to attend the festival.

On Tuesday afternoon 500 of the workmen employed at the Crystal Palace were assembled in the orchestra: they ran up and down in a mass, jumping on the seats, and testing in the roughest manner the stability of every portion of the structure. It is gratifying to state that this rough test did not have the slightest effect upon the erection, which stood "as firm as a rock.

In order to accommodate parties visiting London at the time of the Handel Festival, the principal railway companies have agreed to issue return tickets, available for that week, at reduced fares

We are happy to add that her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert have intimated their intention of being present at the festival.

The spaces in the Crystal Palace usually appropriated to refreshments have been considerably enlarged, and stations for the supply of light refreshments in the centre transept during the performance will be found close to each quarter of the area as well as in the galleries. Dinners will be provided after the performance in the building. The tables will be arranged to accommodate sixteen hundred persons to dine at one time, and all the preparations of the commissariat will be on a corresponding scale.

ART-TREASURES EXHIBITION.—There have been a number of thermometers placed in various positions, inside and outside the building, for the purpose of keeping a record of the temperature of the building This has been done at the suggestion of Mr. Deane, who thinks that the information and experience of this Exhibition will be of immense value to those who may at a future time have the charge of exhibitions of a similar class. The recording of the haste of these thermometers will take place at certain hours during the day. This, with the general statistical department, has been intrusted by Mr. Deane to Mr James Grisham (formerly sketching clerk to the acting secretary). Mr. Grisham has drawn several charts showing the attendance each day, together with the record of the thermometers—thus showing at a glance the cause of the great fluctuations which constantly take place in the attendance of visitors to exhibitions

FINSBURY PARK.—The following is the substance of a letter, on the subject of this proposed park, from the Lords of the Treasury. The Lords Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury will be prepared to propose to Parliament to vote money towards the accomplishment of the formation of Finsbury Park upon the following conditions:—1. The amount to be furnished by the Government to be in the proportion of one third of that furnished by the Metropolitan Board of Works, but not in any case to exceed £50,000. 2. The Government to propose to Parliament to vote one-third of the sum of £50,000 in the present Session, and one-third in each of the Sessions of 1858 and 1859. 3. The Government to make the actual issue of the money after it has been voted, but at no time to be called upon for money for Finsbury park Bills beyond such amount as shall have been actually expended from time to time by the Metropolitan Board of Works. 4. The net cost of the park is estimated at £228,830. At an adjourned Court meeting of the Metropolitan Board of Works on Monday, in the Council Chamber, Guildhall, the consideration of the different clauses of the bill prepared by the solicitors of the board for the formation of a park for Finsbury and the northern suburbs of the metropolis was resumed, and, after a long discussion, clause 16—which proposed that "the expenses incurred by the board of applying for and passing the Act and preparing the plans for the purposes and the expenses of carrying this Act into execution, shall be and are hereby included in the expenses which are authorised to be defrayed by the board"—was agreed to by a majority of eighteen to seven. The morning sitting of the bill were also agreed to, and the board adjourned.——In the House of Commons, on Wednesday night, Mr. Charles Forster moved That the order for the second reading of the Finsbury park Bill be now read and discharged; that the bill be withdrawn; that leave be given to bring in a bill "to enable the Metropolitan Board of Works to form a park for the northern suburbs of the metropolis, to be called "Finsbury park;" and that Lord Robert Grosvenor, Mr Thomas Duncombe, and Mr. Cox do prepare and bring in the same: which was agreed to

MONUMENT TO BUCKEHALAS.—The spot pointed out by the natives as the burial place of Bucephalus, and the tomb erected by Alexander the Great to his favourite horse, stands in the centre of a large plain, between Jelalum and Chunab rivers, in the Punjaub It is raised 30 earth, breasted with marble. The base extends one hundred feet, and diminishes at the top to thirty. You ascend to the top by a flight of two steps, fifty-five in number. In the centre, at the top, which is quite flat, there is a square dome well faced with stone, and is three growing a few yards from the mouth of the well, with a fauuler (a monk, or mendicant) sitting under the shade of it. —Letter from an Officer of the 41st Regiment, encamped close to the Sutlej, to his Family in England.

WONDERFUL DISCOVERIES.—At the meeting of the French Academy of Sciences, on the 25th of May, M Elie de Beaumont announced the following novelties—viz., a method of reproducing animal life! a complete solution of the problem of aerial navigation! a project for a universal language! and a discovery of the cause, nature, and an infallible cure for the cholera!

THE annual dinner of the officers of the 7th Hussars will take place at Grillion's Hotel, Albemarle-street, on Tuesday next.

DESTRUCTION BY FIRE OF MESSRS. PICKFORD'S WAREHOUSES AT CAMDEN-TOWN. On Tuesday night, about ten o'clock, a fire by which property roughly estimated in value at nearly a quarter of a million sterling was destroyed—broke out in the extensive range of premises occupied by Messrs Baxendale and Co. (popularly known by the name of the old trading firm of Pickford and Co.) at the Camden-town goods depôt of the London and North-Western Railway The building contained at the time many thousands of packages of goods, including paper, pitch, tar, saltpetre, colours of various descriptions, and, indeed, almost every kind of merchandise. The combustible articles proved such powerful auxiliaries to the conflagration, that it extended with fearful impetuosity, so that in about twenty minutes the greater portion of the buildings was in a blaze. Some of the employés of the company liberated more than a hundred horses employed in conveying goods to and from the station for Messrs. Pickford and Co.; and the animals, the instant they got into the open road, ran about in wild confusion, to the danger of trampling down the many thousand persons who flocked to the spot. The whole of the metropolis was brilliantly illuminated. In one part of the street were several puncheons of gin, which the heat soon burst, and the spirit ran round the place and into the stables below like a sheet of liquid fire. A great number of engines were soon upon the spot, and Mr. Braidwood superintended their operations; but in spite of all efforts the fire continued, nor was it wholly extinguished until the close of the following day. Of the building nearly one brick remains upon another. All the vast stores of goods in transit for places south of Manchester were destroyed as they stood upon the tracks; and in addition to these many thousands of pounds' worth of property stored in the warehouses, and waiting orders for removal, are lost. It is stated that at least 40 000 quarters of corn were in the building, the whole of which has been burned The railway, which runs from the main line into the warehouses used for loading the vans prior to departing for their destination, has been entirely consumed, and the heavy iron rails are reduced to misshapen masses by the heat of the conflagration; and even iron tenders and goods carriages made of the same material have been fused, and are to be seen lying on the basement in a variety of shapes. Messrs. Pickford and the London and North-Western Railway Company are covered by policies of insurance to the extent of £55,000 upon the buildings and their contents.

On Sunday morning the Red Lion Inn, at Hounslow, was discovered to be on fire, and so rapidly destructive were the flames that the interior of the house was completely gutted in a short time, notwithstanding the efforts made by the Hounslow Barracks and Isleworth fire engines to arrest their progress.—On the same morning the premises of Mr. T. Tessyman, at Hounslow, were discovered to be burnt to the ground. Another fire happened, through a child playing with lucifer matches, in the premises belonging to Mr. S. Williams, Goldsmith-row, Hackney road, and but for the prompt assistance of the neighbours the child would have been burnt to death, as the whole of the bed, bedding, and other articles, were in flames before it could be rescued.

A GENTLEMAN was fined 40s. at the Lambeth Police Court on Monday for smoking in a carriage on the London and South-Western Railway, being the second penalty that he has paid within twelve months for this luxury.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

ALTHOUGH we continue to receive large supplies of gold from Australia and the United States, and there is every prospect of steady imports of silver from Mexico, the value of money in the discount market still rules high. The demand for accommodation, this week, has been rather heavy, and it is very difficult to obtain advances in Lombard street under the Bank minimum. The Bank of England has received a large accession to its stock of bullion, and the reserve is now rapidly improving; nevertheless, the greatest caution is shown in banking circles in making advances to the mercantile body except at a high rate, for that the supply of surplus means is limited; but the caution has evidently been produced by the nature of our advices from India and China, which bring even higher exchanges on the Continent. On this point, the attention of our merchants is now unusually directed, indeed, we may say that it is only with a view to get which to make money now. The last packet took out a very large amount of bullion, which kept the exchanges in check, in India, and possibly to prevent a greater ease in the money markets. But still our advices from India of silk in China over 60,000 bales must have the effect of creating a large amount of bills to meet adverse balances. Thus, we find that the prospects of our market are anything But cheering, more especially as the Bank of France is still buying gold at a premium. It may also be added, that a good deal of surprise has been expressed in various quarters at the comparative inactivity in the demand for national stocks, and at their present low value, considering the extent of the disbursements. On this point it must be obvious to all who have carefully considered the question, that what first 5½ to 6 per cent is offered for money on "call" by the joint-stock banks, and whilst even first-class Consols are sufficiently high, but not doubt, they would advance to some extent in the event of money becoming dearer

The demand for Home Stocks, since we last wrote, have been very moderate, both for money and time. In the quotations, however, the fluctuations have been trifling. Apparently the amount of stock in the hands of the public is very small. The payment of the Exchequer Bills on the part of the Government ceased, the Unfunded Debt has ruled dull and drooping, whilst India Bonds have continued heavy

Advices from Paris state that the Bank of France is nearly ready for the rate of discount to 5½ per cent, from the fact that over £1,000,000 in gold has been purchased by that institution within the last few weeks. We believe however, that a considerable portion of the amount is to pay for silk purchased in Italy. On the Bourse money has been rather plentiful at 5½ per cent. About the same rate prevails at Hamburg; at Berlin, Vienna, and Frankfort it is 5; at Amsterdam 4; and at Brussels 3½ per cent.

The silver market has been very active. Mexican dollars have found buyers at 61d., and our silver has realised 61½ per ounce To insure a supply for the next packet, several parcels of gold have been forwarded to the continent

The week's imports of gold have been about £620,000; of silver, from the Continent, £120,000. The quantity of gold sent into the Bank has been under £200,000—the remainder of the imported supply having been nearly all taken for France.

The following return shows the state of the note circulation in the United Kingdom during the four weeks ending May 9th, compared with the previous month:

English Securities were generally flat on Monday, and prices ruled rather easier than on Saturday. Bank Stock marked 212. The Three per Cents Reduced were done at 92¾ ⅞; Consols, for Money 93¼; Ditto, for Account 93⅝; New Three per Cents, 93⅝ ¾; Bank-stock, Bills, 2s. dis., and the Bonds, 98⅞. On Tuesday the transactions were again limited in extent, Bank Stock, 212⅜ to 214; Reduced Three per Cents, 92¾ ⅞; Consols for transfer, 93⅝ ¾; Ditto for time, 93¾ ⅞; New Three per Cents, 93⅜ and 93½; India Stock, 253; India Bonds, 8s. to 4s. dis.; Exchequer Bills, 2s. to 1s. dis.; Exchequer Bonds, 98⅜ ½. There was rather more business in the market on Wednesday, and prices were somewhat firmer. The Reduced Three per Cents were 92⅝ ¾, Consols for Account, 93 to 93¼ ex div.; the transfer books being closed; New Three per Cents, 93⅝ ¾; Long Annuities, 1860, 3 7-16; India Bonds, 7s. dis.; Exchequer Bills, 2s. dis. to 4s. prem.; Ditto Bonds, 98⅜. On Thursday so little business was passing that the quotations were almost nominal. The Three per Cents, ex div., were 92⅝ ¾; Reduced, 92⅜; the New Three per Cents, 93⅝; Exchequer Bills, 2s dis. to 2s prem., Ditto Bonds, 98⅜ to 98⅝; India Bonds, 3s. dis. The Bank Directors made no change in the rate of discount.

The market for most Foreign Securities has been tolerably firm, and prices almost generally have been well supported. The leading quotations are Buenos Ayres six per cents, 85 ex div.; Brazilian Five per Cents, Half per Cents, 97¾ ex div.; Ditto, Five per Cents, 100; Mexican Three per Cents, 22¾; Peruvian Four-and-a-Half per Cents, 76¾; Peruvian Three per Cents, 53; Russian Five per Cents 104¾ and 105; Russian Four-and-a-Half per Cents, 97½; Spanish Three per Cents, 44; Spanish New Deferred, 25¾; Ditto, Committee's Certificates, 6⅞ per cent; Turkish Six per Cents, 98⅞; Turkish New Four per Cents, 101; Dutch Four per Cents, Half per Cents, 66½; Dutch Four per Cents, 97⅛; and Venezuela Four-and-a-Quarter per Cents, 36

For Buenos Ayres six per cents, 85 ex div., Brazilian Five per Cents, Half per Cents, 97¾ ex div.; Ditto, Five per Cents, 100; Mexican Three per Cents, 22¾; Peruvian Four-and-a-Half per Cents, 76¾; Peruvian Three per Cents, 53; Russian Five per Cents 104¾ and 105; Russian Four-and-a-Half per Cents, 97½; Spanish Three per Cents, 44; Spanish New Deferred, 25¾; Ditto, Committee's Certificates, 6⅞ per cent; Turkish Six per Cents, 98⅞; Turkish New Four per Cents, 101; Dutch Four per Cents, Half per Cents, 66½; Dutch Four per Cents, 97⅛; and Venezuela Four-and-a-Quarter per Cents, 36

The Railway Share Market has been a steady demand. Australasia have realised 88¾; City 63; London and Westminster, 40½; Ottoman, 15; South Australia 36; and Union of Australia, 52½.

Miscellaneous Shares have ruled dull, and the shares in the Atlantic Telegraph have been quoted at 20 to 20 discount. London Omnibus, Mexican and South American, 2½; National Discount Company, 3½; Netherlands Land, 1½; Ditto Eight per Cent Preference, 4½; North of Europe Steam, 10; Peel River Land and Mineral 2. Royal Mail Steam, 59½; Scottish Australian Investment, 1½; Van Diemen's Land, 1½; Wild Waterwerks, 4½; East London, 105; Kent, 80, Grand Junction, Now, 32½; West Middlesex, 98; and Lambeth, 80.

The general tone of the Railway Share Market has been firm, and prices have been well supported. The following are the official closing prices on Thursday

ORDINARY SHARES AND STOCKS. Caledonian, 73½; Chester and Holyhead, 36½; East Anglian, 19; Eastern Counties, 11⅝; Edinburgh, Perth, and Dundee, 33½; Great Southern and Western (Ireland), 103½; Great Western, 64; Lancashire and Yorkshire, 100⅝; London and Blackwall, 6⅝; London and Brighton, 111⅝; London and North-Western, 102½; Ditto, Eighths, 2½; London and South-Western, 100; Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire, 44; Midland, 85½; North-Eastern Berwick, 99½; Ditto, York, 69½; North Staffordshire, 12½; Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton, 33½; South Eastern, 74½; Vale of Neath, 20½

RAILWAYS.—Shares have been dull and variously many changes have taken place in the quotations:—United Mexican have been 3½; St. John del Rey, 15; Alfred Consols, 17; and Great Wheal Alfred, 7.

Friday Afternoon.

The returns of the Bank of France being considered favourable—the stock of bullion having largely increased during the month the Consol Market is steady to-day, and prices are a shade higher than yesterday The three per cents, for ex. div. are 93½ ⅝; the Reduced, 93⅜ ½; and the New Three per Cents, 93⅝ ⅞. The Unfunded Debt is flat, but Foreign Bonds and Railway shares are steady,

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday).—About an average supply of English wheat has come to hand this week. Fine qualities, Friday to-day, however, the receipts of that grain by land-carriage were limited, and the show of samples was consequently small. The attendance of dealers was fair from the country, and we had only a moderate inquiry for all kinds of wheat of home production. Prices, however, were well supported. Only a few cargoes of foreign wheat have come to hand this week; but the demand for that grain has been very inactive. Sales of all kinds have progressed slowly, at barely last week's currencies. Barley, oats, beans, and peas moved off steadily, at very full prices. Linseed and cakes have changed hands at previously quoted rates.

Arrivals this Week.—English, wheat, 3950 quarters; barley, 1610; oats, 20, flour, 930. Irish, wheat, 1200. Foreign, wheat, 21,470; barley, 920; oats, 960.

English. Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 48s. to 52s.; ditto, white, 50s. to 57s.; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 50s. to 55s.; ditto, white, 52s. to 58s.; grinding sorts, 37s. to 42s.; malting ditto, 39s. to 44s.; Lincoln and Norfolk malt, 67s. to 70s.; brown ditto, 65s. to 68s.; rye, 36s. to 38s.; Chevalier, 77s. to 80s.; Scotch feed, 40s. to 42s.; potato ditto, 42s. to 45s.; fine ditto, 46s. to 48s.; tick beans, 35s. to 38s.; grey peas, 35s. to 40s.; maple, 38s. to 42s.; white, 39s. to 42s.; Harlestone and Lincoln, 40s. to 42s. per quarter. Town-made flour, 50s. to 55s. per sack, 40s. to 44s.; Stockton and Yorkshire, 42s. to 45s. per 280 lb. American flour, 37s. to 38s. per barrel.

Scotch. Canary seed has sold steadily, on higher terms. In other seeds only a moderate business is doing. Cakes are dull.

Linseed, English crushing, 70s. to 71s.; Mediterranean and Odessa, 66s. to 67s.; hempseed, 40s. to 42s. per quarter. Coriander, 20s. to 23s. per cwt. Brown mustard seed, 10s. to 12s.; white, 10s. to 12s.; tares, 9s. 6d. to 3s. 6d per bushel. Linseed cakes, 8l. to 8l. 5s. per quarter. Rapeseed cakes, English, 7l. 5s. to 7l. 15s.; ditto, foreign, 6l. 15s. to 7l. 5s.; rape cakes, 4l. 15s. to 5l. 5s. per ton Canary, 74s to 80s. per quarter Clover, from 70s. to 76s. per cwt. Fine pieces are selling at 63s.; and best ditto at 67s. per cwt

Coffee. The transactions in our market have been on a very moderate scale. In prices, however, we have no change to notice.

Tea.—There is a fair inquiry for most descriptions, at full quotations. Bengal, 10d. 6d to 1s. 4d; Congou, 1s. 6d to 1s. 10d; Hyson, 1s. 6d to 1s. 11d; Java, 1s. to 1s. 6d; Pekoe, 1s. to 1s. 6d; Souchong, 1s. 6d to 2s.; Jamaica, 8d. 6d to 9d.; Mauritius, 8d. to 8d. 6d.; Bengal, 3s. to 6s.; Madras, 4s. to 5s. per cwt. Refined sugars is in good request, at from 70s. 6d. to 74s. 6d

MANTLES.—The PATENT PALLIUM—
It is a three-quarter Opera Mantle, so constructed with a view to give great ease to the wearer, and to display the figure to the best advantage. It is made in rich Lyons velvet, in black and all colours, and is trimmed with fringe, lace, and velvet. When in the Ball dress a spring, concealed in the shoulder, throws back the hood, and the mantle becomes a graceful shoulder cape. It is the most elegant and useful mantle ever produced, and is protected in Great Britain, France, and Belgium, by Act and Letters Patent.

THE ALEXANDRE HARMONIUM, AT SIX GUINEAS

ALEXANDRE and SON have made this Harmonium at the lowest price possible, to bring the instrument within the means of all classes. It is in an Oak Case, with Four Octaves, is alike calculated for Private Houses and for Chapels, and is

UNIMPEACHABLE TO THE SCHOOL-ROOM

The Six-Guinea Harmonium will be taken in exchange for any of the more expensive descriptions, without loss or discussion

Alexandre and Son obtained the Sole Medal of Honour at the Great Exhibition at Paris, 1855. Their Harmoniums have been pronounced the best by Rossini, Auber, Adam, Thalberg, Liszt, &c., and by the Professors of the Conservatoire de Paris.

The more expensive Harmoniums range from 10 to 55 guineas. These are brought to the greatest perfection, and are equally adapted to the

CHURCH OR DRAWING-ROOM,

CHAPPELL'S FOREIGN MODEL PIANOFORTE.—This Fifty-Guinea Model Instrument has (under the ordinary Cottage Pianoforte) Three Strings and Two Hammers to compass of Seven Octaves. It is strengthened by every possible means to endure the greatest extremes of heat and cold, and to stand perfectly in any climate The workmanship is of the best description, the tone is round, full, and rich, and the power equal to that of a Richord Grand. The case is of the most elegant construction, in rosewood, the touch elastic, and the exertion very small. Every possible precaution has been taken to ensure its standing well in tune. Chappell and Co. especially invite the attention of the public, the profession, and merchants to the Foreign Model, feeling assured that no Pianoforte, in all respects comparable, has hitherto been made in England at the same price. Every instrument will be warranted, and (if desired) exchanged within twelve months of the purchase.—50, New Bond-street.

ANTELOPE-HUNTING WITH THE LEOPARD, IN INDIA.

ANTELOPE-HUNTING IN INDIA.

THE accompanying Sketch represents the sport of killing Antelopes with the Cheetah or Hunting-Leopard, as practised in India.

The general idea of the mode in which the hunting-leopard seizes his prey is an erroneous one. It is commonly supposed that he creeps stealthily and slowly, availing himself of every inequality of ground for concealing his approach, till within a few yards of his victim, and then springs on it in two or three tremendous bounds; whereas he usually catches it by dint of speed of foot alone.

The sport is usually pursued in the cool of the morning. The leopard is conveyed to the ground which the antelopes frequent on a common uncovered bullock-cart, on which is lashed a native cot for the animal to crouch on. He is usually hooded, that he may be more keen when allowed to see his game. He has also a collar on and a girdle of rope round his loins. Through each of these a cord is passed, the ends of which his keeper holds in his hand, so as to slip the leopard at the proper moment. The keeper and driver both sit on the cart, which the spectators follow either on foot, horseback, or, as in the present instance, on elephants. When the antelopes are seen the driver makes a circuit, so as gradually to approach without alarming them; the spectators either follow close, or go in a different direction, in order to distract the attention of the antelopes. As soon as the cart is within 200 yards of the herd, the keeper unhoods the leopard, and the instant he has caught sight of the game slips him. The leopard springs from the cart and sets off, usually at an easy canter, towards the herd, invariably singling out the buck as its victim, if there be one in it. The antelopes, now thoroughly alarmed, make off at the top of their speed; the leopard gradually, and with apparently perfect ease to himself, diminishes his distance till within fifty or sixty yards of the one he is in special pursuit of; and then, quickening his pace to its utmost, is alongside the animal in an instant with a lightning-like rush. He gives it a pat with his paw, generally on the haunch, which makes it stagger, and ere it has time to recover from the shock the leopard seizes it by the throat and holds it till the keeper comes up and puts the antelope out of pain by cutting its throat. The leopard is immediately rehooded, a little of the blood is caught in a large wooden ladle (carried on the cart for the purpose) mixed with part of the entrails, and thrust under his nose, when he looses his hold of the antelope to lap up the blood, &c. After this meal he quietly submits to be led away to, and put on, his cart and is allowed a few minutes' breathing-time preparatory to a second run. In this manner one leopard will kill four or five antelopes in succession.

Though the above is a description of what generally happens, there are variations according to the ground on which the antelopes are found. If it be dotted with bushes or tufts of high grass, the leopard does take advantage of these to approach his game, at a canter or trot, very close ere he makes his final rush. But, to see the sport to most advantage, it should be on a perfectly open plain, such as antelopes prefer to other haunts, and where there is nothing which the leopard can use to screen his approach: then is seen in perfection his amazing speed, even as compared with the known swiftness of the antelope.

In build the hunting leopard more resembles the greyhound than the rest of his species. He is tall, has straight but not powerful forelegs, a deep chest, light body, very long and muscular thighs, and powerful loins; evidently fitted for great speed rather than strength. When at speed he carries his long and bushy tail in the air, as represented in the engraving. The claws are short, weak, and not retractile. The dewclaws alone, on the fore legs, are very strong and sharp, and with one or both of them, when he gives his prey the preliminary pat before seizing it with his teeth, he gives it a rip or scratch on the side or haun h. It is the hold which these claws take, rather than the strength of the blow from his paw, which causes the antelope to stag[illegible]

HAWKING IN INDIA.

HAWKING is a sport much in vogue in Northern and Central India among the nobles and zemindars. In the Madras presidency it is comparatively seldom pursued. Hawks of the best description are not easily procured, and their training is a tedious and difficult process. The Engraving represents partridge-hawking with the "Shaheen" (one of the best of the long-winged hawks) as pursued in Southern India. It is black, or nearly so, on the head and back, and dark brown on the breast, and one of the swiftest flyers known. The proper time for the sport is early in the morning, just before and after sunrise. The falconer carries the bird hooded, and with jesses on his legs, on his wrist, which is guarded with a stout leather gauntlet. Beaters are employed to rouse the game. When the call of the partridge is heard, or the bird's whereabouts otherwise discovered, the beaters surround the patch of cover in which it is. The falconer's assistant, with the falcon on his wrist, then stands some thirty or forty yards distant from him. The falconer holds the lure in his hands, and when he perceives the well-trained assistant unhooding the bird of cover within 200 or [illegible] seldom escapes.

[illegible] Attorney-General for Ireland in Dec., 1851, not in 1852, as stated.

Lewes.—Sir James Scarlett never sat for this borough. He was twice an unsuccessful candidate; viz., in 1812 and 1816.

We are requested to add the following to the notice of Colonel Wakefield, M.P (see page 489): John Lloyd Vaughan Watkins, Esq., M.P. for Brecknock, Lord Lieutenant for the county and Colonel of the Brecknock Militia, married, first, a daughter of the late Sir George Pocock, Bart., and, secondly, Lhan Luther, daughter of John Taylor Coleman, Esq., LL.D., and widow of Brigadier-General Hughes, C.B.

OPENING OF THE BOSTON, SLEAFORD, AND MIDLAND COUNTIES RAILWAY.

GRANTHAM TO SLEAFORD.

THE Railway between Sleaford and Grantham is now finished, and will be opened on Monday next, the 15th June, for public traffic. A large number of shareholders will travel over the line this day (Saturday, the 13th), and partake of a Dinner given by the Directors and contractors of the railway, a report of which we shall give in our next. The following account of the country through which the railway passes will be read with interest, and has been obligingly furnished by the Rev. Mr. Trollope, of Leasingham, Sleaford. The drawings are by Mr. S. Read.

SLEAFORD.

There is not a better-regulated, a cleaner, or a more rapidly-improving town in the county of Lincoln than Sleaford, forming the capital, as it were, of a large surrounding agricultural district, studded with many groups of villages. Here the electoral privileges of its inhabitants are exercised with moderation, whilst they are stripped of all that accompanying lingering bitterness so frequently exhibited elsewhere; and here no sad contests between Churchmen and Dissenters, nor between employers and the employed, are suffered to disturb the calm surface of that peace by which the whole Christian body was intended to be distinguished from all others. Happy in the possession of a most amiable Vicar, of honourable members of the legal profession, of efficient medical practitioners, a noted architectural firm, and a respectable body of merchants and tradesmen, we rejoice to be able to announce that such a town, together with the locale around it, hitherto forming a sort of territorial oasis, has now been blended into that group of happier districts already intimately connected together by those iron bands which, contrary to the usual signification of that term, will render it free free to trade, free to travel, free to learn. Well paved, well lighted, and, above all, well drained, Sleaford may, in common with Malines, be justly termed "Le propre." Much has been done here during the last thirty years to justify us in terming; it an improving town. During that period a handsome and spacious Sessions House has been built, a set of highly-ornamented almshouses, to which is attached a chapel (an establishment originally founded by the great Sleaford benefactor, Sir Robert Carre, and now in the act of being greatly amplified), national and infant schools, a well-situated cemetery, a beautiful monument raised in honour of the late H. Handley, Esq., a native of the town; whilst amply sufficient funds have just been readily raised for the purpose of erecting a Corn Exchange—a design which will be carried out during the present year; and now we doubt not but that Sleaford's growth will be developed still further, perhaps with unanticipated rapidity.

Whilst we are sanguine as to the future, however, and busy with the present, let us not be indifferent as to the past history of Sleaford, but suffer the chroniclers and historians of ages long gone by to display some of their painstaking labours in our behalf. Whether any Coritanian settlement had been established on the present site of Sleaford previous to the Roman invasion is extremely uncertain, but it was undoubtedly occupied by that last-named great people, although we have not the slightest trace of the appellation by which it was then known. When the Romans had penetrated to this point, probably in the reign of Claudius, and had formed that ancient portion of the great Ermine-street branching from the main trunk near Castor, in Northamptonshire, to the Old Place, Sleaford, under the term of "Mareham-lane," and when they had finished that still greater work, the Car dyke, a navigable canal fifty-seven miles long, connecting the Nen with the Witham, to which there was ready access from Sleaford, such a site, adjoining as it does a river of the purest water, never frozen over, was, doubtless, soon selected wherewon to form a station. Here, accordingly, as might have been expected, are found occasionally Roman traces, reaching from Bully-wells, the source of the river Slea—a term derived from the Saxon "slæd," or winding—to

HANBECK QUARRY CUTTING.

Cogglesford Mill, beyond its opposite limits, where was the original "Vadum," or ford, whence Sleaford obtains its terminal syllable. These remains consist of pottery, a single coin of Nero, some of Commodus, the Tetrici, and many of the Constantine period. Next the Saxons settled themselves in the immediate vicinity of Sleaford, probably on that ridge of high ground seen to the right of the railway on approaching Sleaford, and overlooking the Slea near its source; for here their burial-place was accidentally discovered some years ago, which disclosed many of the unmistakable "fibulæ" (or brooches), beads, rings, bracelets, weapons, and pottery of that people—most of which are now in the possession of his Grace the Duke of Northumberland. In 852 we find that Wulfred was a Saxon Thane here, from the Saxon Chronicle; whilst Bardi, the Lord of Sleaford and Quarrington at the period of the Norman Conquest, was despoiled of his possessions by the Conqueror, who gave the manor of "Eslaforde," as it is termed in Domesday Book, to Remigius de Fescamp, the first Norman Bishop of the diocese. When "Testa de Nevill" was compiled this town was called "Lafford." One of the "ornamentes" of this place in Leland's time (as he terms it) was the residence of John Lord Hussey, at first a devoted adherent of Henry VIII., but afterwards a rebel against his authority, he having taken a prominent part in the great Lincolnshire rising, occasioned by the alterations ordered to be made by the King in the faith and practice of all his subjects, whether they wished it or not, and was, consequently, beheaded at Lincoln in 1536, after which his property passed into the hands of the Carres. King Henry, shortly after this event, slept at the "Old Place," as Lord Hussey's house is now called, and held a Council there, when on his progress to York. In his reign, also, the distinction between "Old" and "New" Sleaford commenced, now always observed.

In the Engraving of the Market-place, which we give, will be seen to the right the site of the Corn Exchange (just about to be built), adjoining the Bristol Arms, also part of the Carre Almshouses; and on the left the Sessions House. But by far the most attractive object here, on its eastern boundary, is the church dedicated to St. Denis, whose venerable tower, irregular form of the decorated period, bell cornice, battlement, pierced parapets, &c., all toned down by the grey colouring which age can alone impart, form a charming subject for the painter's attention or the architect's study. Nor will these be disappointed when they enter one of the time-worn portals before them—leading first into the baptistry, and then into a spacious edifice, whose light pillars, lofty arches, expansive flamboyant windows, surmounted by the long line of later ones above in the clerestory, will be sure to please both; for here one colour as well as form has been judiciously employed, in a sober manner, as becomes a Protestant church, but yet in a decorative and masculine style to which none can object—not with a view to showy effect, but to durability. In front is a light and beautiful chancel-screen, through which the colours of the great Perpendicular chancel window will be seen glistening like jewels, and terminating a vista of low carved oak seats, which do not interfere with the general architectural features of the edifice. To the left a cleverly-designed second north aisle will be observed, taking the place of galleries (now, happily, no more), and a skilful application of an arched buttress lending its friendly aid to support the previously failing tower. Here, also, is a deeply cut and exceedingly beautiful oak pulpit supported on a clustered shaft of mixed Ancaster stone and Purbeck marble, several stained-glass memorial windows, and a series of carved oak stand ards appropriately fitted with ornamental brass branches as gas-burners. We must not omit to mention also the fine monuments dedicated to the memory of the Carre family; although it needs not these to impress its name upon the hearts of the people of Sleaford, whose sons may still, if they choose, be educated at the expense of the Carre Grammar-School ( papers of the Gentlemen's Society of Spalding, of which he was a member and an occasional correspondent. He died the 20th of March, 1736, at the advanced age of eighty-five years, and was attended to his grave in Westminster Abbey by the Lord Chancellor, many Peers, and the whole of the Royal Society, for which he had done so much when living, and whostill possess a precious Lincolnshire relic of this great philosopher—namely, a solar dial, cut by his own hand, on the wall of the house at Woolsthorpe, when a boy, and the cast of his face, taken after death by Roubilliac. 135 years have now passed by since Newton breathed his last; yet his name shines as brightly as ever in the estimation not only of his countrymen, but in that of the scientific bodies of all Europe and America. Well, then, may the inhabitants of Grantham and its vicinity, distinguished as they are for having had the honour of presenting such a man to the world, and of having aided his early studies, be desirous of exhibiting their appreciation of this good fortune by raising up a statue to commemorate so great a philosopher on that open space south of the town, called St. Peter's Hill, which they are shortly about to do.

Sir G. Gilbert Scott has been selected as the artist to carry out this design, and a model of his intended bronze statue has lately been exhibited in the Corn Exchange, which promises well; the pose of the figure and the contemplative expression of the philosopher being at once both dignified and expressive. He is represented in the act of delivering a lecture, and holds an illustration of the same in his left hand, taken from his celebrated "Principia."

OTHER PARTICULARS OF THE SLEAFORD LINE.

After leaving the junction with the Great Northern at Barkstone and emerging from the high ground on the right, termed Barkstone Scrogs, the slim crocketed spire of St. Nicholas Church, Barkstone, surmounting its ancient Norman towers, will be seen; also, the kindred tower of St. Mary's, belonging to the adjoining parish of Syston: both backed up by the woody eminence of Syston Park, crowned with the spacious mansion of Sir John Charles Thorold, Bart., famed for the size of its conservatory and the value of its classical library. A little further on the line passes immediately at the foot of the small tower of St. Wilfrid's Church, Heningtun; and on the left will be seen that of St. Nicholas Carlton Scroop, situated on a manor once belonging (as its name indicates) to the ancient family of Scroop, and afterwards to the no less ancient one of Palmer—one of whom (Sir Geoffrey Palmer) was Attorney General temp. Charles II., and concerned in Lord Strafford's trial—at present represented by Sir John H. Palmer, of Carlton Park, in Northants, and of Carlton Curlieu, in Leicestershire. Beyond this rises the tower of Normanton Church, and the Hall, the property and residence of Anthony Willson, Esq., of South Rauceby, the newly-elected M.P. for the Southern Division of Lincolnshire; next the spire of St. Botolph's Church, Quarrington, on the right.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

MINISTERS' MONEY (IRELAND BILL)

On the suggestion of the Earl of Donoughmore, Earl GRANVILLE undertook to lay before the House an account of the receipts and expenditure of the Irish Ecclesiastical Commissioners during the year 1856, prior to proceeding with the second reading of the Ministers' Money Bill.

THE CASE OF MR. SHEDDEN.

Earl GREY drew attention to a petition from Mr. W. P. R. Shedden, complaining that by a decision of the Court of Session in 1803, and of the House of Lords in 1808, obtained in his infancy, he has been deprived of his status of a natural-born subject of this realm, and moved that it be referred to a Select Committee.

The LORD CHANCELLOR opposed the motion, and after a lengthened discussion, in which Lord Campbell, Lord Lyndhurst, Lord Brougham, and other noble Lords took part,

Their Lordships divided, and the motion was negatived by a majority of 15 to 11.

The Cinque Ports Act Amendment Bill was read a second time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

The Earl of Hyde took the oaths and his seat for Sandwich.

The Finsbury Park Bill was read a second time.

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION.—In reply to a question from Mr. DILLWYN, the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said the subject of the reform of the Civil Service superannuation Act was one of great difficulty. It was still under the consideration of the Government, and he could not, therefore, state precisely when a measure would be introduced on the subject.

OATHS BILL.

The second reading of this bill having been put by the Speaker, and no member rising to speak to it, it was carried amid cheers and laughter. At a subsequent period of the evening Sir P. THESIGER gave notice of the amendment he intends to move in Committee on the Oaths Bill, the effect of which will be to retain the words "on the true faith of a Christian."

CIVIL SERVICE.

On the order of the day for the House resolving itself into a Committee of Supply,

Lord GODERICH called attention to the last report of the Civil Service Commissioners, and to the present system of admission to the civil service. The noble Lord complained that the system of unrestricted competition promised by the Government had not been carried out to the extent which had been expected, which was the more to be regretted, as wherever the system had been resorted to its application had been eminently successful.

Mr. BASS inquired as to who the parties were who nominated the candidates for examination?

Mr. HUTCH also called attention to the report of the Civil Service Commissioners, and asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the system of competitive examination of candidates for admission to public offices, to which he stated on the 4th of July, 1856, the Government would study to give extension, was now in more general and effective operation than by the report it appears to have been during the latter part of 1856. He thought the Government had not redeemed its pledge to the public.

Mr. MALINS said it was a strange public competition if it were under the new system as difficult to get nominated for examination as it was under the former system to obtain the office itself.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said it was a mistake to suppose that these nominations were thrown open to the public. The offices were in the patronage of the Crown, and the principle was, that examinations should established to secure superior fitness for office on the part of the candidates. The nominations for examination rested with the heads of the respective departments of the Government, with the exception of the smaller offices, which lay with the head of the Government. The system of competitive examinations had been very much extended, and by adopting it in the Treasury the example was given to all the other governmental departments.

Colonel SYKES was fully of opinion that a portion of the patronage of the Crown should be thrown open to public competition.

THE ITALIAN LEGION.

Mr. M. MILNES put a question to her Majesty's Government respecting the engagement entered into with the Argentine Confederation, for the reception and employment in certain numbers of the officers and soldiers of the Italian Legion; and asked whether the authorities of the Argentine Confederation have adhered to the stipulations of that agreement?

Sir J. CLARKE entered into an explanatory statement, from which it appeared that all the officers and soldiers had been released from their engagements to the Argentine Confederation at their own request.

PROBATE AND ADMINISTRATION BILL.

This bill was brought from the Lords, read a first time, and ordered to be read a second time on Monday next.

THE ARMY ESTIMATES.

The House having gone into Committee on the Army Estimates, they were agreed to after considerable discussion. The House then resumed, and the resolutions were reported

JOINT-STOCK COMPANIES BILL.

The House subsequently went into Committee on the Joint-stock Companies Bill, and all its clauses were agreed to without any amendment.

FRAUDULENT TRUSTEES BILL.

On the order of the day for the second reading of the Fraudulent Trustees, &c., Bill,

Mr. Serjeant KINGLAKE offered a suggestion to the Attorney-General that he should introduce a clause making it punishable for a trustee to use trust funds for his own purposes, even when no fraud was contemplated, but where loss might accrue to the parties interested.

Mr. ROLT stated several objections to the bill which would require that its clauses should be considered with much caution in Committee.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL expressed a hope that hon. and learned gentlemen would frame their suggestions into clauses, so that they might be practically considered on a future stage of the bill.

The bill was then read a second time.

SAVINGS BANKS.

The Savings Banks (No. 2) Bill was read a second time after some discussion, in which Mr. Turner, Mr. Grogan, Mr. Ayrton, Mr. M'Cann, Sir H. Verney, and other hon. members took part.

The bill was then ordered to be committed on Monday next.

The Alehouse Licensing Bill was read a second time.

The second reading of the Married Women's Reversionary Interest Bill was carried without a division by 151 to 5.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer brought up the bill upon the Sound Dues, which was read a first time.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

The Princess Royal's Annuity Bill was read a second time.

OUR INDIAN ADMINISTRATION.

The Earl of ELLENBOROUGH drew attention to the mutinous spirit recently exhibited by the native troops in India, which he feared might be in some measures attributed to the attempts made to proselytise the natives, and said he was surprised at seeing the names of a number of British officers as subscribers to missionary schemes. It had even been reported that Lord Canning was a liberal subscriber to these associations for converting the natives.

Earl GRANVILLE said he gave no credit to these rumours, for were Lord Canning so injudicious he would certainly be unfitted to be Governor-General of India.

DIVORCE BILL.

The Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Bill, on its recommittal, led to considerable discussion and the introduction of various amendments.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

Mr. ROEBUCK gave notice that on Tuesday next he would move a resolution with a view to the abolition of the Lord Lieutenancy of Ireland, and the creation of a fourth secretary of State.

THE FATAL MISCHANCE AT BELLEISLE

Mr. DILLWYN asked whether the Government had received any information respecting the circumstances attending the death of James Wilkins, a seaman on board the John and Edward, whose honour, Alexander Smith, who was killed in the harbour of Belleisle, on the 24th day of May last, by a shot fired from the French war-schooner Maratch.

Lord PALMERSTON said the Government had received the fullest information upon the subject. The John and Edward had entered the harbour without any colours displayed, which was an error on the part of the captain in entering a foreign port; but, nevertheless, the conduct of the French officer was perfectly indefensible. The French Government had not given the British Government an opportunity for remonstrance; for it had of its own accord expressed the deepest regret that the officer of the Maratch, and dismissed him from the service. A communication had been immediately made by the French Minister to Lord Cowley, expressing great regret for the occurrence, stating that the officer had been dismissed, and that steps were being taken to mitigate the loss to the friends of the unfortunate seaman who was killed.

GRAND JURIES

Sir F THESIGER moved for leave to bring in a bill to dispense with the attendance of grand juries at the Central Criminal Court, and at courts of general and quarter sessions holden within the metropolitan police district, except in particular cases. The grand juries of the metropolis had repeatedly presented themselves as useless, if not an actual obstruction, to the proper administration of justice. Indeed, the necessity for a grand jury was entirely obviated by the police courts; and he confined the operation of the bill to the metropolis, for reasons might render it desirable for country grand juries to assemble which would not be applicable within the jurisdiction of the police magistrates of London.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said the hon. and learned gentleman should have the hearty support of the Government in carrying his measure through Parliament, and thought the subject could not have fallen into better hands than those of his hon. and learned friend.

Mr. BOWYER said the bill was a great innovation upon the law of England, and the greatest caution should be observed in dealing with it.

Leave was then given to bring in the bill.

LAND TRANSPORT CORPS.

Mr T. DUNCOMBE observed that the pensions of the members of the Land Transport Corps, presented on the 12th day of May last, complaining that the War Department had not fulfilled the conditions under which they enlisted, be referred to a Select Committee. A Committee had been granted to him in the last Parliament, but before it had entered upon its functions the Parliament was dissolved, and he now sought its reappointment.

Mr. TOM DUNCOMBE seconded the motion.

Lord PALMERSTON explained away some of the grievances complained of, but said he would accede to the Committee.

The motion was then agreed to.

WILLS OF BRITISH SUBJECTS MADE ABROAD.

Sir F. KELLY moved for leave to bring in a bill to give validity and effect to the wills of British subjects made abroad. The bill was rendered necessary in consequence of a recent decision, by which the will of a lady (Mrs. Calcraft) was defeated because she had resided for many years in Paris. He regretted to introduce a clause to prevent its having a retrospective effect; but he feared a peril his bill by omitting it. The law, as laid down by this decision, was contrary to common sense, and the sooner it was rectified the better.

Mr. MALINS seconded the motion.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said he would not object to the introduction of the bill, but warned the House of the difficulty of dealing with the subject, as it would probably involve them in the nature of the law of all European states.

After a short discussion, in which Mr. Slaney, Mr. B. Hope, and Mr. Bowyer took part, leave was given to bring in the bill.

LUNACY IN SCOTLAND.

The LORD ADVOCATE obtained leave to bring in a bill to alter and amend the laws relating to lunatics in Scotland. The bill contemplates the establishment of a Lunacy Board, consisting of one commissioner, a medical inspector, a secretary, and a clerk. The commissioner would have the power of granting licenses, and of laying down rules for the management of asylums. The salaries of the board to be paid out of the Consolidated Fund. New asylums would be built, and for this purpose Scotland would be divided into eight districts, and the necessary funds raised by assessment. District boards are to be established, and proper precautions taken against the recurrence of such atrocities as have created so much feeling of astonishment throughout the country.

Sir G. GREY obtained leave to bring in two bills—one further to amend the Act relating to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and to continue the Act concerning the management of episcopal and capitular estates in England; the other to promote the establishment and extension of reformatory schools in England.

Mr. MASSEY obtained leave to bring in a bill to amend the laws relating to highways.

Mr. CLIVE obtained leave to bring in a bill to amend and explain the Inclosure Acts.

Mr. ATTERTON obtained leave to bring in a bill to amend the law relating to the conveyance of land for charitable uses.

Some conversation took place on the subject of the new Netley Hospital (introduced by Sir D. NORREYS), which ended in the Government promising returns connected with the selection of the site, plans of construction, and all other necessary information on the subject.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL for IRELAND obtained leave to bring in a bill to amend the Irish Militia Act.

The Irish Constabulary and the Irish Court of Exchequer Bills were severally read a second time.

The Joint-stock Companies' Act was after some discussion read a third time and passed.

MEDALS AWARDED BY THE EMPEROR OF THE FRENCH TO ENGLISHMEN FOR DEEDS OF BRAVERY. A second-class gold medal has been given to Mr. Arthur Brooks, custom-house officer at Dungeness, and first-class silver medals to James Dagwell and David Wallis, boatmen of that port, for the assistance they gave on the night of the 10th January last to the shipwrecked crew of the French lugger Alberline, of Granville. A first-class silver medal has also been given to Mr. Owen, an English farmer, for saving at the risk of his own life that of a French sailor, belonging to the Sully, of Bordeaux, which was wrecked near Forth Gufforth on the 9th February last.

THE PRESENT ASPECT OF SLAVERY IN THE UNITED STATES.—This, as viewed by its own organs, seems dark enough. The Newbury (South Carolina) Rising Sun, pealing a tocsin through the South, expresses itself in the following lugubriously gratifying terms: "Clouds and darkness thickly hang over and surround our political horizon. A spirit of agony and terrible sadness spreads its wings, and, like the ocean of sand in the deserts of Africa, sweeps and rends and tears the land in which we live. A storm is the prevailing element of a horrible tempest. Hark the low muttering rumbling of distant thunder breaks upon the stillness! How fast it is approaching! How it grows! The lurid air is heavy and chill. The storm approaches nearer and nearer it comes, louder and more loud it howls. Man the sails all hands to their posts. The South expects every man to do his duty! Life and death, honour and liberty, are involved. Let each heart be firm, each nerve be steady. The conflict will be fierce as hate and malice can make it. Stand firm. Hark! what crash was that? Kansas is gone! Hark! a triumphant shout from the spirits of the storm! Missouri is yielding! How fierce the blasts, how lurid the lightning! How terrible the tempest! sea and heaven are commingled! How horrible, yells terrific, roar our ears! Virginia is assailed! Gloomy, dark, terrible, howls the tempest! Watchman, what of the night? All is dark, dark; no dawn appears.

LITERATURE.

ANTIQUITIES OF KERTCH, AND RESEARCHES IN THE CIMMERIAN BOSPHORUS, WITH REMARKS ON THE ETHNOLOGICAL AND PHYSICAL HISTORY OF THE CRIMEA. By DUNCAN M'PHERSON, M.A., of the Madras Army.

The juxtaposition of the words Arts and Arms forms a resonant alliteration often used by the popular historian; but in history itself they are too often in discord—witness the sack and most barbarous destruction of the Museum of Kertch, after our capture of this place a few months before the fall of Sebastopol. But, although many antiquities were then destroyed, the numerous tumuli in the environs of this city still remain; most of which have not yet been explored, and the assemblage of the Turkish Contingent at Kertch, where the corps passed the winter of 1855-56, has led to the present publication. Dr. M'Pherson was head of the medical department, and this "scanty leisure afforded from more important and urgent avocations" was employed in a study of the Greek colonisation of the Crimea, as well as its present ethnology; to which were added excavations and antiquarian researches in the neighbourhood of Kertch. Dr. M'Pherson modestly acknowledges that his very prettily illustrated work is, as regards erudition, more or less a compilation from German and other archæologists, whose names he gives; but the wonder is that, with all these helps, a book of so much interesting antiquity, and so agreeably illustrated in chromo-lithography, should have been produced in so short a time.

Dr. M'Pherson commences with the testimonies of the ancients as to this portion of Europe, where a little before Homer dwelt the Cimmerians—the Cimbri of the Romans, and the Kymyr of our ancient Gael—who were of that great Celtic race which spread at one time from Galatia to Cumberland, or the land of the Cimbri. Dr. M'Pherson also considers that the coasts of the Euxine were the theatre of the wanderings of Ulysses; and identifies the description of a land-locked anchorage as that of Balaclava. We see no reason for removing Ulysses into the Mediterranean, as the description he quotes is applicable to every mountain-bordered gulf in the Ionian Sea or Adriatic, where there are dozens of such creeks. But the Greek colonisation of all the coasts of the Euxine is a matter of certainty. Witness Odessus (now Varna), Theodosia (now Kaffa), and many others, one of the most important of which was Panticapæum (now Kertch), which was the capital of this part of the dominions of Mithridates, who shared with Hannibal the glory of having been the most really formidable of all the enemies of Rome a Sovereign who had an army of several hundred thousand fighting men and four hundred galleys.

The Russian Government, for some years before the war, had a commission sitting for the excavation of these tombs and the preservation of the more valuable portion of their contents. A few of the choicest pieces were sent to St. Petersburg; the rest were retained for the Museum at Kertch, which was established in the year 1828. Ten of the tumuli, or mounds, were excavated annually, and the director of the Museum, M. Ashik, has produced an important work on this interesting subject. Of the antiquarian mine of which this learned director says, "How few are there who know that that kind of ancient vase which is improperly called Etruscan is also dug up in Russian ground; that Greek sculptures of the highest art are dug out amongst us; that we possess splendid monuments of Cyclopean architecture; and that, far from both empties, on the extreme edge of the southern steppes, towards the Black Sea, there exists another Herculaneum—another subterranean Etruria—rich in treasures often unique in their kind, and which throw light upon the darkest periods of the past."

We must refer the reader to the work of Dr. M'Pherson for a descriptive catalogue of the curious objects exhumed—some of which are very pleasingly illustrated in colours, so as to have all the effect of reality. As usual, funerary urns, ceramic and bronze vases, make a prominent figure. The most interesting discovery was one made some years ago of a Cyclopean subterranean gallery, with a pointed arch roof, terminating in a sarcophagus chamber, containing the remains of a Persian satrap. Around his neck was a necklace of massive gold, with enamelled ornaments of blue and green; his shield, which lay beside him, was of fine gold, and divided into twelve compartments, ornamented with dolphins and masks

THE PRACTICAL ANGLER. By W. C. STEWART. Edinburgh: Adam and Charles Black.

That patient class of British sportsmen for whom the Blink Bonnies and the Skirmishers of the turf live and race in vain, and whose hearts are not with the Kestrels or the Amateurs on the waters of the Solent, or in the tents of the scorers at Lord's or Kennington Oval, but continue to believe, summer after summer, in the spirit of the old song—will take this terse little book to their bosom, and make it the companion of many a river-side pilgrimage. Its aim is not to give any highly-tinted dissertation on the joys of angling, or to produce a series of mental pictures of its most favoured haunts. Alas for the silver front, the author had a much more practical and deadly object in view; and, although the gentle craft have had teachers, and to spare, since their quaint old Izaak wrote, it was reserved for him to prove that almost, if not quite, as good sport may be had in clear water as in coloured.

> Oh! the gallant fisher's life,
> It is the best of any!

Mr. Stewart brings a large stock of enthusiasm, and fifteen years' practice, to his work. He has gleaned hints for his letterpress, and his book and bare illustrations, from nearly all the first amateurs and professional anglers of the day, and exchanged minds with Jamie Baillie, the veritable senior wrangler of fly-fishing in Scotland. Delightful as it may be to a beginner to wander rod in hand along the banks of some river in May or June, among meadows rich with the daisy and the cowslip, or to contemplate nature in her grander, but not less beautiful, aspect on the rocky, heather-clad slopes of a Highland stream—the pleasures of the day always bear some proportion to the weight of the basket brought home; and the finest scenery influences are but an indifferent compensation for an empty creel.

By carefully studying the precepts so pithily and pleasantly enunciated here, no tyro need despair, after he has undergone his probation, of becoming a practical angler; and even those who worthily aspire to that distinction already, and have acquired the necessary neatness of hand and quickness of eye, may have their observation not a little sharpened, and their practice improved. The volume is remarkably complete in all the details of the trout-fishing art. Fresh-water trout—the causes of their decrease, the season when they are in highest condition, and every phase of their natural history, claim a chapter. All the minutiæ of an angler's equipment are gone into with quite a Gerard like minuteness, and so on artificial fly fishing, flies, fly dressing, May-fly fishing, and trouting with the fly. Angling with the worm, which he considers to possess one very solid advantage over fly in the superior size of the trout caught, is also copiously handled, as well as minnow and partridge baits. In such fishing, in which the accomplished angler and the tyro are most upon a par, has nevertheless no small charm in his eyes; and his book is appropriately concluded by some precepts on "the best means of filling a basket in May, June, July, August, and September." The author has shown, to quote the late Mr. Barnes, "lots of grupple" in dealing with his subject; and we trust that his readers may be able to act up to the spirit of the phrase, and remember his advice when they feel the thrilling nibble and have to go gallantly into action at a moment's notice with a Highland salmo ferox in the approaching summer.

"A SISTER OF MERCY."—Miss Dix, who has taken so admirable a part in the [illegible] of the Scotch lunatics upon public notice, [illegible] with a degree of extraordinary devotion to her sense of duty. So feeble in body that she can scarcely walk half a mile, she has travelled over the whole of the United States, and induced nineteen of the local Legislatures to erect and endow such [illegible] asylums. She has extended her influence to the creation of [illegible] ses and the establishment of [illegible] hants on many parts of the American coast. THE "GREAT EASTERN" STEAM SHIP, 22,6

THE MONSTER SHIP AT MILLWALL.

IN our Journal of the 30th ult. we presented our readers with a View of the Great Eastern as she appeared before the midship section had been built or plated up. And now, pursuing our intention of producing a series of Illustrations explanatory of the whole external and internal economy of the great ship, we lay before them authentic diagrams of the Longitudinal Section, Deck Plan, and three Transverse Sections of the Vessel from the original drawings and designs of the engineer.

It may not be out of place in an article having immediate reference to the most stupendous project of modern times in steam navigation to glance briefly at the rapid progress which has been made in the art since the fertile mind of Henry Bell—originally a working house-carpenter in Glasgow—conceived the happy idea of applying the new principle of steam power to a trading vessel on the Clyde. His boat, which was named the Comet, was fitted up with an engine and paddles, and began to ply as a passenger-boat from Glasgow to Helensburg in January, 1812, and was soon followed by a series of steam-vessels, for which the river Clyde has since become so famous. The curious in steam lore will be gratified to learn that the original boiler of the Comet is still in the possession of Mr. Scott Russell. We can well imagine the astonishment of the curious Scotch bodies who rushed from all quarters to witness the wonder of a "boat driven by reek" (smoke), and "making an awfu' stour and splutter in the water." The clumsy Comet, with her two sets of radiating paddles, resembling very much in their appearance four large malt-shovels revolving on each side of the vessel, was certainly a strange sight; and, when to these singularities was added the marvellous circumstance of a vessel being propelled against wind and current by an invisible power, we can scarcely wonder at the credulous and superstitious country people being firmly impressed with the belief that "the smoky deevil was at seavy," and that "auld Clootie himself had mair to do wi' the matter than honest folks ken't o'." The prejudice against the smoke was indeed so strong amongst ignorant people even where that the constructors of early steam-boats endeavoured to disguise the odious fact under the designation of a mainmast; and some even went so far as to raise up the pretence of a topmast amongst the thick folds of smoke. Habit has, however, long since removed this prejudice; and the most timid lady that ever ventured a voyage on the Bridgeroom from Blungard to Chelsea watches the funnel puffing forth its volumes of black smoke without any apprehension of danger, except from a shower of treacherous blacks on her new Sunday bonnet. The average speed attained by the Comet was five miles an hour, but she was soon eclipsed by the Elizabeth, which started for the conveyance of passengers between Glasgow and Greenock in March, 1815, and averaged nine miles an hour. The unusually luxurious manner with which the cabin of the latter vessel was fitted up demanded an elaborate description, and it is recorded that the best cabin, 11 feet wide and 21 feet long, was covered with handsome carpeting; that "a sofa clothed with maroon is placed at one end of the cabin, and gives the whole a warm and cheerful appearance. There are twelve small windows, each furnished with maroon curtains, with tassels, fringes and velvet cornices, ornamented with gilt ornaments, having altogether a very rich effect. Above the sofa there is a large mirror suspended, and at each side book-shelves are placed containing a collection of the best authors for the amusement and edification of those who may avail themselves of them during the passage."

It requires some effort of the mind, after accommodating itself to the limited appliances of the little Clyde boat, to grasp in all its magnitude the grand design of the Great Eastern. The marvel is, however, not so much in her stupendous size as in the perfect novelty of the principle upon which she has been constructed. Contrary to all precedent in European shipbuilding, she has, so to speak, no vertebral column: the all-important portion of the anatomy of an ordinary vessel is entirely wanting. She is, in fact, a ship without backbone or ribs; and, unlike other vessels—the keel of which is first laid down and the timbers or framing erected therefrom and afterwards sheathed over—the new ship has been built in sections, the midship portion being first built up to its full height, and the other sections, fore and aft, built up afterwards in like manner, and joined to the preceding section. This will be best understood by reference to our Illustration last week which shows the ship in progress of building. Perhaps the best mode of conveying a tolerably correct idea of the principle applied by Mr. Brunel to the construction of the Great Eastern is to say that it is similar to that of the tubular bridge over the Menai Strait. He conceived the idea of an immense iron tube, or gallery, running fore and aft the entire length of the ship, and divided perpendicularly into twelve compartments by water-tight bulkheads, or partitions. These compartments would be again divided horizontally and longitudinally by the lower deck, so that should the water enter the lower part of the vessel it would be confined to the compartment by which it had been admitted, and could neither rise above the lower deck nor force itself into the adjacent compartments. A most important principle in the construction of ships is thus developed in the simplest and most effective manner. The strength of the structure depends, therefore, not upon a keel, which would evidently be insufficient for the weight that with every motion of the ship must not with enormous leverage throughout its immense length, but upon the central tube or gallery formed by the decks above and below, and by the lateral walls, shown in the diagrams of the transverse sections. The bottom, it will be seen, is quite flat, so as to allow the ship when loaded to be grounded on a gridiron for the purpose of repairing, painting, or clearing the hull from grass or barnacles, which in warm climates would be likely to attach thereto. The cellular principle, if the term may be applied to Mr. Brunel's plan, is carried out in the construction of the hull of the Great Eastern, which may be best described as consisting of a double shell or "skin,"—as it is technically termed—carried up as far as the lower deck, as shown in the diagram. This double skin, formed of plates of iron, is joined by longitudinal webs or girders, formed also of plate iron running the entire length of the vessel, with intervals of about three feet between each from the keel to the lower deck, these spaces being again closed up in lengths varying from twenty to sixty feet. Thus the outer and inner skins form a double wall, divided into innumerable water-tight cells, giving the greatest possible strength with the least possible weight. The upper deck is in like manner formed of a double skin, for a width of twenty feet on each side, with iron girders or beams binding one side to the other; so that the vessel is, in fact, a system of isolated yet strongly-connected cells—forming the most buoyant and, as it would seem, the most substantial structure that ever was designed for the resistance of the perils of the ocean. We should not omit remarking upon the curious fact that, in case of ballast being required, the compartments between the outer and inner skin of the bottom will hold 3000 tons of water applicable to this purpose.

With a capacity for carrying 8000 tons of cargo, independent of 11,000 tons of coal, and an enormous weight of machinery, material, stores, &c., she is also intended to accommodate 4000 passengers; or, in cases of emergency, if required for the transport of troops, 10,000 men could be safely conveyed by her to any part of the world. It is as a passenger-ship that her superiority over the largest ocean steamer will be most apparent. Let us imagine those noble saloons, which resemble a magnificent hotel, or, to speak more accurately, a series of first-class hotels, for each division or compartment of the ship will form a distinct saloon of from forty to eighty feet in length, by twenty-six feet in width—the largest being nearly as spacious as the saloon of Drury-lane Theatre—lighted at night with gas manufactured on board the vessel, and filled with company, chatting, reading, working, or employed according to their various tastes, while the leviathan ship rushes almost noiselessly, and with hardly any perceptible motion, over the submissive waves of the Atlantic or Indian Ocean. A reference to the longitudinal section and deck plan will explain the internal economy and proportions of these saloons, which run through the centre of the ship, with sleeping apartments on either side. The advantage of this arrangement over the old one, by which the passengers' cabins and saloons were placed far aft in the ship, will be appreciated by those who know that the motion in the centre of a vessel is necessarily much less than at either extremity. Nothing that art can suggest for rendering the accommodation for passengers equal to that which could be found in the best London hotel will be wanting in this floating palace—rich carpets, costly hangings, magnificent mirrors, libraries and instruments of music, paintings, carvings, and costly fittings all, in short, that the most luxurious West-end club-frequenter could require—will be provided, including the not-to-be-forgotten comforts of an excellent cuisine and a well-stocked cellar, with spacious sleeping apartments, warm and cold baths, and a noble promenade on the upper deck, where, weather permitting, the ladies, sheltered by bulwarks between five and six feet high, may display the newest Parisian and London fashions with as much effect and to almost as many admirers as on a fine afternoon in Regent-street or the Esplanade at Brighton.

No possible inconvenience can be felt by the passengers from the heat of the furnaces or the vibration of the engines. This portion of the machinery, being in the lowest part of the vessel, is overarched by a strong iron roof, and surrounded by the coal-bunkers, through which neither heat nor sound can penetrate to the upper decks. The communication between the several engine rooms is effected by means of two small longitudinal tunnels, on the principle of the Menai Bridge, already referred to. Through these the engineers can traverse the whole length of the ship without interfering with the bulkheads, which divide this portion of the vessel into water-tight compartments, precisely as the saloons above.

We have now penetrated to nearly every corner of this wonderful structure—favoured her deck from stem to stern; crossed tremendous gulfs on planks, that on our fancy seemed as slight as a French vaudeville; insinuated ourselves through mysterious portholes; investigated all sorts of metallic dungeons; oscillated upon unsteady ladders over deep abysses, with a desperate contempt of danger that would have caused the whole board of directors in the office where we have our life secured to turn pale with apprehension for our safety. One locality, however, still remains to be visited. Cast your eyes upward to that combination of timbers, twenty-five feet above the deck, called a "trawler," on which an engine of sixty-horse power is employed, lifting from the yard the enormous boilers, engines, furnaces, and machinery necessary for the construction of the vessel, and depositing them in their proper places in the hold. From the platform of this massive structure we get a bird's-eye view of the ship; and, looking down on the deck, obtain a pretty clear idea of its plan as represented by our Artist. We see how light will be transmitted through two rows of skylights, running longitudinally on both sides of the deck into the upper saloons and cabins, by corresponding skylights into the saloons on the lower deck. Aided by our intelligent cicerone, we can imagine five stunted Vesuvian funnels two before and three abaft the paddle-wheels—vomiting forth wreaths of smoke from five pair of furnaces (unless sailmaker coal be used); and six masts, of more graceful proportions, tapering upwards from the deck, with their canvas wings woeing the winds, and gratefully tendering their aid to their faithful ally, Steam, who, panting and groaning amidst fire and water far down in his gloomy chambers, is day and night, and night and day, with the force of a thousand giants, to carry the good ship in safety to her desired haven.

From our exalted position we behold the broad Thames, bearing many a noble argosy upon her bosom, flowing softly between her busy shores. Away there lies Greenwich, with its regal hospital and beautiful park and hill, crowned with the old white-walled Observatory, where—according to popular belief—the Royal Astronomer holds confidential communication with comets and other wandering stars. That black hull floating lazily at her moorings is the old Dreadnought turned from the trade of war to the arts of peace. Carrying our eye along the shore, Deptford and its naval depôt claim a passing glance; while far off in the distance we can discern the tops of the watch towers of the Crystal Palace at Sydenham. On the opposite bank of the river the eye wanders over the flat uninteresting Isle of Dogs, taking in successively Blackwall, Poplar, Cubitt's New Town and Church, and the East and West India Docks. We can just distinguish the dome of St. Paul's looming dimly and grandly, as one of Ossian's heroes, through the eternal mantle of fog in which the city wraps itself up, like a rheumatic old gentleman. Wonderful London! What mighty projects of wealth and greatness are now ripening in thy fruitful bosom? What glittering bubble will next be blown by the breath of fraud for fools to catch at? What golden dreams of the future will be rudely broken by——pshaw! that dreadful yard-bell which proclaims that the working hour is done, and a respite from toil comes to the sons of labour! At the welcome signal grim artificers stream forth into the sunny light of evening, hammer and anvil, and furnace and engine, are deserted; the deafening fall of hundreds of hammers on the ringing sides of the ship suddenly ceases; panting engineers wipe their steaming brows, and inhale deep draughts of heaven's blessed air; the young Vulcans—whom we have seen everywhere about the ship, working at those movable little forges in which the bolts and rivets are made and hot for fastening the plates—forsake bellows and shovel with surprising unanimity, and scamper away pell-mell to enjoy most probably the cheap luxury of a swim in the river. It is time, too, for visitors to retire; and, as we slowly descend the easy stages from the ship's deck, we feel ourselves more than ever filled with admiration for the originality of conception, boldness of design, skill, enterprise, and practical ability which could work out a scheme so beset with difficulties at every step.

In the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS of May 30 it was omitted to be explained that the large Engraving at pp. 518-519 represents the Great Eastern steam-ship in course of construction, about eighteen months since.

THE KING'S VISITORS.

I.

THE King holds court
With his regal train,
And the wild wind blows
At his window pane,
And pattering falls
The wintry rain;
And if the King,
So merry and free,
Would give his crown
And his kingdom's fee,
And his fleets that ride
On the wild wide sea,
To stop the fall
Of the midnight rain—
The gushing, flushing,
Frolicsome rain –
And silence the wind
At his window pane,
He'd offer his riches
All in vain.

II.

And Care crawls up
To the same King's door,
And takes her seat
At his proud heart's core,
And tells him deeds
That were done of yore;
And if he'd give His good right hand,
His Dukes and Earls
That round him stand,
And his Queen's bright eyes
That glad the land,
To keep such guest
From his darkening door,
The nestling, wrestling
Spirit of yore,
And take her tooth
From his heart's red core,
The Spirit would answer him—
"Nevermore!" CHARLES MACKAY.

AERIAL MACHINE.—Viscount Carlingford, of Swift's Heath, Kilkenny, has patented an aerial machine, with which he anticipates obtaining great results. The aerial chariot in form is something of the shape of a boat, extremely light, with one wheel in front and two behind, having two wings a light concave faced to its side. It is also provided with a rail that can be raised or lowered at pleasure, and with oars for giving an elevating or declining position, and worked by a cord.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

Her Majesty the Queen has just presented to the 23rd Regiment of Royal Welsh Fusiliers a beautiful Cashmere goat, from the herd in Windsor Great Park: this is the fifth present of a similar kind made by her Majesty to this distinguished regiment.

The Botanical Society of France is this year to explore the environs of Montpellier, Cévennes, and part of the coast of the Mediterranean

Her Majesty has conferred the Order of the Companionship of the Bath on Major Brownrigg, Deputy Inspector General of Constabulary in Ireland, as a recognition of his services to the Government.

In the country districts of Bavaria Sunday-schools are to be established this autumn for giving instruction in rural economy, the best way of keeping farmers' accounts, and also introducing these branches of education into the primary schools

The Stockport, Disley, and Whaley Bridge Railway was opened for public traffic on the 9th inst.

Four 68-pounder guns, captured in the late Russian war, have been forwarded from Woolwich Arsenal to York, Leeds, Sheffield, and Huddersfield. A number of these trophies have been dispatched to the various provincial towns of the kingdom, and also to the colonies, to be erected in the parks or favourite localities, as places of resort.

There is a bill in the House of Lords, presented by Lord Rossie, by which young workpeople unable to read are to be sent to school, and the expenses paid by the employers. Where the parents of any young person above the age of six are unable to pay for education, the board of guardians may pay the school expenses.

Advices from Lisbon state that the contract for the railway between Lisbon and Oporto lately entered into with Sir Morton Peto has been definitively approved by the Legislature, the measure having just passed the Chamber of Peers.

A regular service of screw steamers is now established between the ports of Kiel (Holstein, and St. Petersburg, the departures from either port taking place every Saturday morning.

The Lord Lieutenant of Ireland has accepted the invitation of the Marquis of Waterford to take up his abode at Curraghmore, on his Excellency's visit to the agricultural show during the month of August.

Mr. William Blanshard, of the Northern Circuit, has been appointed Recorder of Doncaster, in the room of the late Mr. Robert Hall, M.P.

Extra steamers are to be dispatched from Southampton on the 27th of October and 12th of December next, in correspondence with steamers from Suez to Ceylon, Madras, and Calcutta. There will also be an extra departure from Calcutta about the 15th of March, 1858, for the convenience of homeward passengers

An aggregate meeting of "The Militia of the United Kingdom" was held on Tuesday in the Music Hall, Abbey-street, Dublin, to solicit from the Government the recognition of its services during the war, and asking that, "in the event of an augmentation of the army, they may be called upon in preference to Continental paid troops."

A new steam-frigate, bearing the name of Pedro Nunes, recently constructed for his Highness the Duke of Oporto, has been fitted in the same elegant style as the Victoria and Albert.

Since the foundation of the Female Medical College of Pennsylvania the institution has qualified for their profession 164 ladies.

The specie arrivals of last week amounted to £1,760,000—of which £213,000 was from America, £232,000 from the West Indies, and the remainder from Australia.

An Imperial decree has conferred on the Appreuagne Company the privilege of working the gold-fields of French Guiana over an extent of 500 square leagues.

An ingenious spirit-compass binnacle life-boat lantern, prepared by Mr. Dent, of the Strand, is to be supplied to each of the life-boats of the Royal National Life-boat Institution.

The arrangements of the local committee of the British Association in Dublin are now assuming a definite form, and give promise of a successful meeting. Wednesday, the 26th August, is the day appointed for the meeting of the Association

The designs for the monument to be erected to the memory of the late Duke of Wellington in St. Paul's Cathedral are in course of being arranged, and will be open for public inspection in Westminster Hall early in July.

Lord Elgin embarked at Suez for China on Saturday last.

A distinguished party of Etonians dined together at the Salthill Hotel, Kingstown. His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland presided.

The fourth meeting of the Fox Club takes place at Brookes's on Saturday (to-day).

In the year 1829 the number of newspapers published in the metropolis amounted to about 18,000,000; in 1830, to 20,000,000; in 1831, to about 22,000,000; and at present the number is about 45,000,000.

The third session of the International Congress of Statistics is to commence at Vienna, August 31.

The French experimental squadron has just returned to Toulon after a cruise in the Mediterranean of about three weeks.

In the half year ended last Lady day the sum of £1,979,385 was expended in the in-door maintenance and out-relief of paupers in England and Wales, against £2,058,455 in the corresponding period of the year 1856; £801,076 was expended for in maintenance, and £1,486,807 for out-relief. There was a decrease of pauperism in every English county except Durham, which exhibits an increase of one per cent.

On Sunday last the People's Subscription Band commenced playing in the Regent's Park, from five till seven o'clock.

The Newry Telegraph announces, as a matter of great importance to its town and district, that a natural passage has just been discovered into the Lough of Carlingford.

The Mayoress of Liverpool is about to be presented with a silver cradle (in accordance with a custom of that municipality), to commemorate the birth of a child during her husband's year of office.

The Harrow Speech-day for this year is fixed for Thursday, the 2nd of July. Lord Palmerston has promised to preside at the Harrow Dinner in London, on Wednesday, the 8th of July

On Monday a special general meeting of the Female Orphan Asylum, Westminster-road, was held in the board-room of the asylum, for the purpose of electing ten orphans from a list of thirty-two candidates.

The Harveian Oration this year at the College of Physicians will be delivered on Saturday, June 24, by Dr. Copland, the author of the well-known medical dictionary.

During the last seven years India has drained the world of nearly 400,000,000 of silver rupees—or £40,000,000 sterling.

The largest number of persons assessed to the Income-tax last year was under Schedule "D" (professions and gains), when the number was 11,363 at £100 and under £150 a year.

The Queen has commanded the Bishop of London to preach before her Majesty and the Court in the private chapel within Buckingham Palace on Sunday (to-morrow).

A Medjidieh decoration has just been received by Mr. John Bake Husband, the house surgeon of the North Devon Infirmary. Mr. Husband served as a medical officer in the English army at the siege of Sebastopol, and was present with the fleet at the last bombardment and capture of that city.

Cardinal Wiseman, in a pastoral just issued to the several Roman Catholic congregations in London, announces that within the last twelve months no less than seven religious edifices have been opened in his diocese, and others are now in course of building. Amongst other institutions founded has been an hospital presided over by the Sisters of Charity who served in the East during the late war.

The "Monday Evening Concerts for the People" having been brought to a close for the present season, a grand concert was given in aid of the guarantee fund on Thursday evening, at St. Martin's Hall.

Mr. Cuthill, of Camberwell, has already produced some early Black Prince strawberries from the open ground. This is just fourteen days earlier than last year, and the crop is enormous, there being in many cases 40 fine fruit on one plant

The second annual meeting of the National Reformatory Union is to be held at Willis's Rooms at one o'clock to-day (Saturday)—Lord Brougham President of the Union, in the chair. Resolutions were moved on the Industrial Schools Bill, on a normal school for reformatory teachers, and on the disposal of young persons leaving reformatories.

Among other curiosities lately sold at the public auction-rooms in the Rue Drouot were two very curious parchments, one being a receipt given to the treasurer of Louis XI. by the King's tailor for the sum of 30 sols for putting a new pair of s sewn to an old leather pourpoint of his Majesty; and the other, a receipt from the Royal shoemaker for 15 deniers for furnishing a box of grease for the King's boots.

MINERAL STATISTICS.

FROM a very early period—a period long prior to the Roman subjugation—the British Islands have been renowned for the variety and extent of their mineral productions. The nations of antiquity derived the tin which they employed in the manufacture of their bronze statues, ornaments, and weapons, from Cornwall; and there is abundant evidence to show that a regular carrying trade was established by the merchants of Tyre between the ancient Bolerium and the Delta of the Nile. We know that the Roman colonists worked the mineral districts of this country extensively for gold, silver, lead, and tin; and they have left us some notable examples of their engineering skill in shafts which have been sunk and levels which have been driven through some of our most intractable rocks in Cardiganshire, Derbyshire, and Shropshire. Our Kings, particularly the Edwards and the Henrys, granted many charters which gave especial privileges to the miners. The Black Prince was himself a zealous searcher for subterranean treasures, and with some 600 miners from Derbyshire he instituted an exploration of Northern Devonshire, from which, it is said, he derived sufficient wealth to defray the expense of his wars in France. Elizabeth greatly encouraged British mining, and she introduced a number of German miners, who brought with them a better system of exploitation, and thus developed the extraordinary resources of Cardiganshire, Derbyshire, and other counties. From Cardiganshire Sir Hugh Middelton derived the wealth which enabled him to bring the New River from Ware to London. From the same mines Mr. Bushell drew the treasures which enabled him to clothe the army of Charles I.; and they subsequently became the subject of "The Great Mine Adventure"—a bubble scheme which involved so many in its wreck as to lead the House of Commons to organise committees of inquiry, in the vain hope of bringing the fraudulent directors to justice. Prince Rupert was governor of two mining corporations—the Mines Royal, and the Mineral and Battery Works; and he appears to have been an ironmaster. Oliver Cromwell was the proprietor of blast furnaces in the Forest of Dean; and, even while he was guiding the Republican army, he never relaxed in his endeavours to develop the mineral resources of his country.

Through all time, therefore, there has been a constant drain upon the metalliferous formations of this island. With our advancing manufacturing and commercial importance that drain has been steadily increasing; yet our mines of tin, lead, copper, and iron continue to add many millions sterling each year to the wealth of the nation. The mineral productions of the British Islands exceed that of the whole continent of Europe; and yet, while nearly every country has long since established systems of statistical inquiry, and thus carefully recorded the progress of exhaustion, and, in many cases, established salutary checks upon reckless mining, England has proudly talked of her inexhaustible treasures, and kept no count of her natural wealth. This imprudent system has been too long continued; and attempts which have been made to arrive at correct returns of our mineral productions have been several times defeated by prejudices, or misdirected from less honourable causes.

Gradually, however, these obstacles are giving way before a sense of the real advantages to be derived from an exact knowledge of the rate which production maintains to demand, and it is with much satisfaction that we learn that, after many years of persevering labour, the Keeper of Mining Records in the Museum of Practical Geology is now enabled to rely upon a large number of exact returns from our mines and collieries, from which he can regularly compile, with a degree of correctness not hitherto approached, the "Mineral Statistics," now published annually by order of the Treasury, from a copy of which, now before us, we extract the following particulars of the annual produce:—

Tin.—Of tin ore Cornwall produced 8947 tons, and Devonshire 320 tons. The average price of the ore being £68 per ton gives it a value of £628,780. The produce of metal from the tin ore was as nearly as possible 6000 tons, which may be valued at £720,000. This is the production of 129 mines in Cornwall and of 14 in Devonshire.

Copper.—The copper ores of Western England sold at public sales during the year amounted to 196,193 tons, which produced of fine copper 13,576 tons 11 cwt., the money value of the ore being £1,393,739. Beyond this, Ireland, Wales, and some other English counties, sold at Swansea 14,921 tons of ore, the money value of which was £116,910; and 7340 tons of metallic copper were produced from ores purchased by private contract from British mines. In addition to this, the Swansea smelters purchased of imported copper ores 28,982 tons, producing of copper 4650 tons, the value of which was £517,650. The total value of the copper smelted in England in one year being £2,887,307 17s.

Lead.—The total quantity of lead ore raised from the mines of the United Kingdom in the same period was 92,330 tons; which produced of metallic lead 73,091 tons, and from which 561,966 ounces of silver were extracted. The total value of the pig lead obtained was £1 892,655; and of silver, £140,476.

Iron.—Of iron ore there was mined 9,553,741 tons. This enormous quantity of iron ore fed 689 blast furnaces, which produced 3,218,151 tons of pig iron. The average price of which, being £4 14s. per ton, gives a market value equal to the enormous sum of £13,515,260.

Coal. The total number of collieries in the United Kingdom are as follows:—

|---|---|---|
| In England | .. .. .. | 1881 |
| ,, Wales | .. .. .. | 310 |
| ,, Scotland | .. .. .. | 403 |
| ,, Ireland | .. .. .. | 19 |

And from these there was raised, during the year 1855, 64,453,070 tons of fuel. Previously to the inquiries which were instituted by Mr. Robert Hunt, of which the above is the result, the estimates of the annual produce of the British coal-fields were the merest guesses possible. R. J. Taylor, in his "Statistics of Coal," making the produce 31,500,000 tons; T. R. Macculloch, "Dictionary of Commerce" (1845), 34,000,000 tons; Mr. Braithwaite Poole adopted the same sum in his "Statistics of British Commerce;" while Mr. Joseph Dickinson, Inspector of Coal Mines, in his Report, rose to 54,000,000 tons.

Speculations have been made on the duration of our coal-beds, upon the continuance of which England's manufacturing greatness depends. Now, all these were founded upon the supposition that 34,000,000 tons of coals only were removed from the earth annually; but we now know that above 64,000,000 tons are every year withdrawn from our carboniferous strata, and that with the extension of the application of steam this quantity will be greatly exceeded.

Beside those more important sources of our national wealth, we find in these "Mineral Statistics" returns of the quantities of zinc ores; of salt produced in Cheshire, Worcestershire, and at Carrickfergus, in Ireland; of sulphur ores, of which we find Wicklow produces 58,000 tons; of arsenic, of nickel, and cobalt ores. To add to the value of the information thus communicated, the imports and exports of all these mineral products are given. An attempt has been made to estimate the production of clay for porcelain and for commoner purposes, and to give the quantities of building stones obtained from the principal quarries throughout the United Kingdom. The work before us is the return for 1855; that for 1856 not being yet published. The information upon which these "Mineral Statistics" depends is collected by the Keeper of Mining Records, who regularly visits the principal mineral districts, or it is furnished voluntarily by the mineral proprietors. As it is of the utmost importance that so important an interest as that of mining, which adds nearly £30,000,000 per annum to the national wealth, should be correctly represented, we would press upon all concerned the importance of aiding the compiler of these statistics by furnishing him with exact returns from those mines or collieries in which they are engaged.

CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS

J. D. B.—It is true that the celebrated French chess-player, M. St. Amant, is making a short visit in this country, and it is much to be hoped that we shall here have a well matched contest with the present day with a last of that quality which a few years since earned for him the first seat in the list of the best players in France.

Z. Z.—You appear to have proved inconclusively that Mr. Boden's ingenious stratagem, No. 690, is capable of another and a very commonplace solution in five moves.

A PRACTICE AMATEUR.—1. It is certainly not judicious to sacrifice a piece for two Pawns, under the circumstances mentioned. 2. The games in each set average probably five hours each.

W. E., Weighton.—See note to "Z. Z."

E. G. C., Rodosbern, is cordially thanked for his budget of beautiful Problems, and for the pleasant notice which he sends us.

A NATIONAL AMERICAN CHESS TOURNAMENT.—It is certainly a notable fact that America has exhibited, during the last few years, an enlarged appreciation of the game of chess and a growing fondness for its pursuit. The depth and extent of this mind relation are as fully manifested by a small increase in the number of amateurs and chess clubs, to the establishment of a Magazine especially devoted to the interests of that science, as by the regular insertion of Chess matter in several of our weekly journals. A step further in the same direction is proposed in the following circular, which has been issued to the principal chess players throughout the United States. We welcome with pleasure the spirit of fraternity which it breathes, and we trust that the movement may be crowned with success:—

"The undersigned, having been appointed a committee by the Chess Congress held at Cincinnati, in April, 1856, to make arrangements for a National Chess Tournament, to be held in the city of New York, during the present year, have the honour to announce that they have completed the duties assigned them, and to invite your attendance at the Rooms of the New York Chess Club, No. 290, Broadway, on the 1st day of June, 1857, at 10 o'clock A.M., for the purpose of organising the Tournament.

"The following rules and regulations have been adopted by the committee, and will be observed in the conduct of the Tournament:—

"1. The Tournament shall commence on the 1st day of June, 1857, at the Rooms of the New York Chess Club, No. 290, Broadway, New York, and shall continue from day to day, Sundays excepted, until completed.

"2. The number of players shall be limited to sixteen, and the first sixteen persons who shall present themselves at the Rooms of the New York Chess Club, on the 1st day of June, 1857, and shall pay the sum of five dollars each, shall be entitled to play in the Tournament.

"3. The Tournament shall be conducted according to the rules and regulations adopted by the Chess Congress held at Cincinnati, in April, 1856.

"4. The following shall be the order of play:—The first player drawn shall play with the second player drawn, the third with the fourth, the fifth with the sixth, the seventh with the eighth, the ninth with the tenth, the eleventh with the twelfth, the thirteenth with the fourteenth, and the fifteenth with the sixteenth. The winners of the games shall play in the same order, and the winners of the games shall play for the first and second prizes.

"5. The Tournament shall be played in the Rooms of the New York Chess Club, No. 290, Broadway, New York, and the games shall be played from 10 o'clock A.M. to 5 o'clock P.M., and from 7 o'clock P.M. to 11 o'clock P.M., each day, Sundays excepted.

"6. Each player shall be allowed two hours for the first fifteen moves, and thereafter at the rate of fifteen moves per hour.

"7. The committee would respect those clubs and players to whom this circular may be sent, to address their replies to the Tournament committee, New York Chess Club, No. 290, Broadway, Two-mile Stone, New York, CHARLES G. MEAD, JAMES THOMSON, Executive Committee.

"W. W. MORE, Chairman. DANIEL W. FISHER, Secretary. New York, January 1st, 1857. April 17th, 1857."

 We are again obliged, by the length to which the Games &c., run, to defer the answers to very many Correspondents to the first number of next week.

CHESS IN THE METROPOLIS.

The following light skirmishes were played by MR STAUNTON against two of the best players in the St. George's Chess Club consulting together:

| 20. Kt to Q R 3rd | Kt to Q B 6th | | |

(White is embarrassed with his pieces. His simplest and surest course was to play Kt to K 6th; and then, after Black, as their best, moved K R to B 3rd, by playing Q to K 6th, the game was won. The move made by him was, however, properly allowed up, wins equally, and is a menace less commonplace.)

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

TROOPS AND WARLIKE STORES FOR CHINA.—On Monday the steam-transports Cleopatra and Mauritius, having been fitted at Deptford, for the conveyance of troops to China, were ordered to proceed to Portsmouth, to embark the 93rd Highlanders and a detachment of Artillery: the vessels are expected to sail to-morrow. The Rangoonda transport sailed from Gravesend on Monday, with 1800 tons of warlike stores, live shell, shot, and ammunition, to be conveyed to Hong-Kong, for the troops engaged in the China expedition. The Princess Charlotte, 104, has been declared ready to embark the 1000 troops that she will convey to China, where she will be used as a hospital. The Princess Charlotte will sail on Monday next, in company with the paddle steamer Victoria, fitted as a floating steam-battery.

The half-yearly public examination of the officers and gentlemen cadets studying at the Royal Military College, Sandhurst was brought to a close, with creditable results, on Saturday last, before a collegiate board, at which were present the Right Hon. Lord Panmure, the Duke of Cambridge, the General Commanding-in-Chief, Major-Gen. Sir G. A. Wetherall, K.C.B., the Adjutant-General of the Forces; Major-General Sir R. Airey, K.C.B., the Quarter-master-General of the Forces; Major General Sir Harry D. Jones, K.C.B., the Governor; Colonel C. R. Scott, the Lieutenant-Governor; and Lieutenant-Colonel P. L. M Dougall, the Major and Superintendent of Studies.

The Royal Marine battalions, upwards of 900 in number, were on Monday mustered in the barrack-square at head-quarters, Woolwich, by the Commandant, Colonel Brown, in preparation for the half yearly general inspection, to take place on Wednesday next.

THE 15th Regiment, under Colonel Cole, arrived at Aldershott camp on Sunday from Gibraltar, via Portsmouth. At present they only muster 686 rank and file.

THE machinery recently created in the new boring mill at Woolwich Arsenal was on Saturday last in process of being tested and worked for the first time prior to completion, when, under a moderate strain, the entire row of shafting intended to set the various wheels in motion fell to the ground, carrying away with it, fitting-screws, and bearing-boxes of iron and the whole of the brackets by which the shafting was sustained to the wall, extending from end to end of the factory, about 200 feet. The damage is calculated at about £1000.

THE East India Company's troop-ship Gloriana arrived at Gravesend on Sunday from Madras, having on board detachments of troops belonging to the 42nd Light Infantry and 84th Regiment. The Gloriana sailed from Madras on the 16th of February.

THE East India Company's troop-ships Owen Glendower and Vernon have arrived at Gravesend, having on board nearly 900 invalid troops from regiments serving in India. The Owen Glendower sailed from Barrackpore on the 11th of February last, and the Vernon from the same place two days later.

The United States' steam-frigate Niagara was taken on Saturday last into Portsmouth harbour, and moored alongside the Rodney, 90, two-decker. She was taken into the basin or steam basin on Monday, and her alterations immediately commenced, to enable her to receive her portion of the submarine cable.

IN consequence of the recommendation of the authorities of the storekeepers' department, Royal Arsenal, Woolwich, Lord Panmure has issued an order for several of the chief foremen of the department named to be discharged, with liberal pensions for long and faithful services.

A SPLENDID BANQUET was given by the Grenadier Guards, at the London Tavern, on Saturday evening last. Covers were laid for sixty. The chair was taken by his Royal Highness Prince Albert. Among the company were his Serene Highness Prince Edward of Saxe Weimar, Colonel Wood, Colonel Ellison, Colonel Wynyard, Colonel Lindsay, Colonel Stanlope, Colonel Cadogan, &c.

THE officers of the 17th Lancers gave their annual dinner at the Clarendon Hotel on Friday, the 5th inst., when they were honoured with the company of his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge.

THE SEAMEN OF THE NORTH-EAST PORTS.—The seamen of the Tyne and Wear have signed a petition to Parliament wherein they state various facts with regard to the loss of life and property in the North Sea. They assert that during the last five years the shipwrecks have amounted to 5128, and during the same period 4443 persons have lost their lives by casualties at sea. The petitioners pray that Legislature to afford them protection by compelling owners to submit their vessels for survey before departure, and to see that the place set apart for seamen is sufficient for health and cleanliness; and that a harbour of refuge be forthwith constructed on the north-east coast of England.

THE ROMAN GALLERY, BRITISH MUSEUM.

THE soil of Britain is so rich in remains of her Roman civilisation that we are happy to find this fine room in the national Museum appropriated to their exhibition. It is a noble apartment of lofty dimensions, and situated immediately adjoining the entrance-hall on the left, and forms an approach to the various saloons and galleries devoted to antiquity. The length of the room is divided by bold pilasters, having a deep entablature and cornice, which is continued round the room. From the pilasters extend across the ceiling bands of corresponding breadth, dividing it into six or seven parts. These are subdivided into coffers, deeply set, and moulded with the egg-and-dart ogee ornament, the panels bearing chocolate-coloured patterns. The beams, or bands, are also enriched with a line and the honeysuckle pattern. The walls are painted grey, excepting the lower part, which is a dull red or porphyry tint, divided from the upper part by a neat moulding, enriched with the Etruscan pattern. The colour of the lower wall is effective in bringing out in good relief the objects placed in front of it.

On entering this gallery from the entrance-hall the visitor will see on the left, just under the windows, and flat upon the wall, some fine specimens of tesselated pavement, brought from Withington, in Gloucestershire; some very crude sarcophagi, altars bearing inscriptions, &c. One of the sarcophagi was found at Southfleet, in Kent; and another in Hayden-square, Minories, which has been engraved in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS. There are also some remains taken from London-wall, in the rear of the Trinity House. On the right hand, in the upper compartments, is another series of reliefs let into the wall in a similar period—one found upon the site of the south-west angle of the Bank of England. Below these, on pedestals and bases, are placed a series of busts, chronologically arranged. In front of the pilasters stand several draped figures too mutilated to be recognised; and one of Hadrian, in military costume. This statue was found in Hadrian's Villa at Tivoli.

Among the busts which have been recognised are those of Julius Cæsar, B.C. 101; Augustus, B.C. 63; Tiberius, B.C. 42; Nero, A.D. 37; Domitia, wife of the Emperor Domitian, found in the site of the Cæsar at Rome. There are also busts of Trajan; Hadrian; and Antoninus, the favourite of Hadrian, in the character of Bacchus; Hadrian, undraped; Ælius Cæsar, the adopted son of Hadrian, A.D. 138; a bust supposed to be Julia Sabina, wife of Hadrian; Antoninus Pius, in military costume, A.D. 86; Marcus Aurelius, veiled and crowned with a wreath of corn; Annia Faustina, the younger wife of Marcus Aurelius; also of Lucius Verus, colleague of Marcus Aurelius, A.D. 120; a head of Venus—Venus preparing for the bath; small statue of Venus; a torso of Venus; a bust of Juno, wearing a broad fillet.

INTERESTING ANTIQUARIAN DISCOVERY IN BIRCHIN-LANE, LOMBARD-STREET.

THE modern celebrity of this metropolitan thoroughfare is great. Addison called it "a certain street of the greatest credit in Europe," which remains to this day. Lloyd's News tells us, one of the earliest newspapers, was published in this street; Pope was born here; and Guy, the bookseller, kept shop here. Here, too, lived the Pope's merchants, who dwelt in wafer-cakes and rashers.

These matters, however, but relate to the upstructure of the street's history. As you stand at either end, you are struck with the narrowness of the thoroughfare—unmistakable evidence of an old London street; and here it makes the ground—so valuable as a good-field. But what will the reader say to the Lombard-street antiquity of 1500 years since, of which the following is at least as often as it is turned up, affords irrefragable evidence. Not a few localities of Roman London which are so rich in remains of that period? In the "Curiosities of London" (pp. 470-471) we find these interesting data:—

Lombard-street highway passes over the site of Roman houses, and has been the field of three great finds of Roman remains—in 1730, 1774, and [illegible] the latter, in its substratum of wood-ashes, supposed to indicate the burning of London by Boadicea. Ten feet below the street level was found a wall of the smaller sized Roman bricks paved by flues or cells (as described) and brick pavements, in Birchin-lane, a tessellated pavement of elegant design, heaps of Roman coins, glass bottles, keys, and beads, vessels and fragments of earthenware, and a large vessel of red Samian ware richly embellished, and reminding us that "Rome did not want its Wedgwood." The causeway, which Wren considered the northern boundary of the Roman station, was then discovered in Birchin-lane.

Upon this site, in the rear of the banking-house of Messrs. Glyn and Co., have just been discovered the portions of Roman pavement engraved in the adjoining column.

Each of the fragments is less than three feet in diameter; the most perfect piece is that on which is displayed a figure resembling a flying dragon or fish, the tail of which is finned, a serpent. This figure is spiritedly drawn, it is outlined in black tesseræ; the body is of drab colour, with additional touch of white relief upon the prominent parts. This piece has been surrounded by a border of the guittoche pattern. The fins of this animal, we should observe, are in red; the ground of the whole is yellowish. The second fragment is mostly composed of two borders, of the Etruscan and guittoche pattern, the guittoche being in red, yellow, white, and black tesseræ in both fragments. It is difficult to say what form this pavement had; the second piece is carved, as if forming part of an arch, and this must always remain a mystery, owing to the mutilation to which it has been exposed. The depth at which it was found was about nine feet. A portion of it ran under the pavement in Birchin-lane, and stretched into the road, where it was damaged in making the sewers. It is believed by Mr. Nicholls, the clerk of the works, to have been of considerable size, as much of the tesseræ is mixed up with the rubbish. By the kindness of Mr. P. C. Hardwick, the architect of the building for which the site is being prepared, we are enabled to give our readers a sketch of the two patterns.

A piece of charred wood has been found with the remains, thus connecting the discovery with that in 1786, when the supposed ashes of Boadicea's burning of London were found. A portion of window mullions and sill found with the piece of wood points to a later age. The site is exactly in the angle formed by 'Change-alley, Birchin-lane, and Lombard-street.

CARVED DOORWAY IN WATER-LANE.

WITHIN the present century the metropolis abounded in richly-carved doorways, and over doors of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, which were so many picturesque specimens of the carver's art, whilst they served as convenient shelter. These examples were most frequent in the City; and those persons who delight in watching these relics of old art must remember their piecemeal disappearance, or their entire removal upon the rebuilding of the premises of which they were once ornaments. Their purpose in new edifices is mostly served by the classic portico which so often disfigures our new house-fronts, exemplifying the failure of a grand feature upon a small scale. Some old mansions about Mark-lane and Fenchurch-street, the residences of City merchants before it was the fashion to reside in the metropolitan suburbs, will be remembered as presenting some of the richest specimens of carved doorways. One of these, which had ornamented the Ship Tavern in Water-lane, near where it debouches into Billingsgate, has just been removed, in the removal of the old premises. The carving is in rich and picturesque taste, the character of which is depicted in the Illustration. As in all probability this ornamental over-door will not assort with the style of the premises when rebuilt, we hope this fine old carving will be preserved in some more appropriate place

THE NEW CRICKET-GROUND, MANCHESTER.

CRICKET IN MANCHESTER.

THE Manchester cricket season of 1857 promises to be marked by energy and spirit; and the various clubs in the neighbourhood, numbering above a dozen within four miles of the Exchange, are preparing to carry on the noble and athletic game with unusual éclat. The appropriation of the site of the Manchester Cricket-ground for the Art-Treasures Exhibition Building has necessitated the removal of the meetings to an adjacent plot of ground. A commodious clubhouse has been built and the ground levelled and prepared ready for the opening match between Manchester and Liverpool, fixed for the 10th and 11th of June.

The Western Club commenced operations on their new ground at Eccles, near Manchester, on Saturday, 23rd May, when, notwithstanding the somewhat unfavourable character of the weather, a great number of ladies and gentlemen were assembled, and watched with interest the cricketers, and listened to the strains of the military band which was in attendance.

The grounds are well situated, in the most picturesque environ of Manchester, and are laid out most tastefully. There are, in addition to the space devoted to cricket, a large bowling-green, and an excellent quoiting-ground. A pavilion of corrugated iron, tastefully ornamented and decorated, has been erected for the use of the members by Messrs Edward T. Bellhouse and Co., of Manchester. This erection covers a space of about 50 feet by 40 feet, and contains a dining-room 40 feet by 22 feet, and some half-dozen smaller rooms, and is a good example of the adaptation of iron as a building material. The committee has expended about £1000 in the preparation of the grounds and the building of the pavilion. We engrave a View of the grounds and the gay assemblage, sketched on the opening day.

MR. AND MRS. GERMAN REED'S NEW ENTERTAINMENT.

THE accompanying Engraving represents two of the most pleasing of Miss Horton's personations in the new entertainment, which we noticed generally last week. The first figure is the Flower-boy, in the act of singing, with charming simplicity and grace, one of Mr. Reed's prettiest songs:—

Cowslips and violets, daisies and primroses,
Fit for a Queen to wear,
Stuck in her crown like—Hey, lass, won't you buy 'em,
To stick in your fine black hair?
Come, buy, who'll buy?
Look at them, smell them,
A poor lad would sell them
Come, buy, come buy.
Violets, daisies, come buy.

The other figure is the Scotch Fisher-girl, a character so truthfully sustained that we might imagine Miss Horton to have passed her life among that singular sisterhood. It is here that she introduces the song "Jock o' the Mill," which is so full of Caledonian nationality, and which she sings with playful archness—

Wha's coming o'er the hill,
Wha's coming here?
Lassie, why smile ye so
As he comes near?

'Tis na your father, lass,
Wrinkled and gray,
'Tis na your brother, lass,
Why smile ye sae?

See where he's coming noo,
Down fra the hill;
Who is't? I ken him noo
'Tis Jock o' the Mill.

THE CROWNING GRACE OF THE WAR.

HER Majesty the Queen will, on Friday next, deliver with her own hands, to the heroes who have deserved them, the medals which are the greatest, and in some cases the only, rewards of the courage displayed in the Baltic and in the bloody battle-fields of the Crimea. The honour will be conferred publicly, and in sight of admiring and enthusiastic crowds, in Hyde-park—the largest open space which the metropolis affords. The place has been well chosen, for if all England could see the spectacle—as all England, Scotland, and Ireland will read of it—the moral effect would be all the greater on the spectators, though the reward might be none the more precious to the gallant recipients. Incapacity, nepotism, and inefficiency in high places have been long ago rewarded or condoned; but the day of the real heroes, whose unflinching bravery preserved unsullied the fame of the country, when the least hesitation on their part might have imperilled it, has come at last. The ceremony of Friday next will form a fitting and graceful conclusion to the war. During the progress of the drama it was often impossible to repress the applause or the tears of the spectators, who day by day, in our remote islands of Great Britain, watched with painful interest the evolutions of the story. But, the tragedy having ended, the real heroes, whatever their rank or want of rank, are called before the curtain, to receive, in the name of the British people, and at the fair hands of their Queen, the badge and the recognition of their bravery—dearer to the true soldier than all the more vulgar rewards of rank and pay which have fallen to the lot of many who did not fight as they fought, or suffer as they suffered, in the cause of their country.

That the blood and the services or such men will not again be needed, in our time, should be the earnest prayer of every one. But, though none of us can see far into the future, statesmen and those who make public affairs their study can see more than enough in the present state of Europe to justify them in the belief that the late War settled nothing, and that the late Peace left for a future day, and, perhaps, a not very remote one, the consideration of many urgent and exasperating questions. Europe in 1815 was reconstructed on a false and unstable basis. In 1856 that wrong basis was left undisturbed, although in the interval, and especially during the progress of the war for the independence of Turkey, several of the greatest nations on the Continent, oppressed by bad laws, by a denial of their commonest natural rights, and by the grasp of strong and savage military despotisms, looked to a new settlement—long foreseen and ardently prayed for—which should do them justice. The golden opportunity was allowed to pass away. The statesmen of France were not equal to the task; and those of England—being linked with an ally to whom they were compelled to defer—accepted a peace before it had been thoroughly conquered, and spared an enemy who, by every consideration of true policy as well as justice, ought not only to have been effectually restrained, but severely punished. Was the Emperor of Russia effectually restrained? His attempt immediately on the conclusion of the peace to construct military railroads, for the easier subjugation of Turkey, is of itself a sufficien answer to the question. Was he severely punished? Europe in its length and breadth laughs at the idea of such punishment as he received. The nations expected that he would have lost Finland on the north, and the Crimea on the south, and that he would have been condemned to pay all the costs of the war which the bad ambition of his father provoked. But he was excused from these penalties, not from considerations of mere mercy, or from those of a greater policy involved in the issue, but because one of his most powerful opponents was unequal to the duty of further warfare, and did not like to press hard upon the foe, lest the foe should refuse all terms, and continue the struggle.

There is a kind of statesmanship, as there is a kind of philosophy, which takes heed of nothing but the passing hour, and which says, like the fool in Scripture, "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die;" but such statesmanship, like such philosophy, is of the very lowest. It was not such statesmanship that led Great Britain into the war, but it was such statesmanship, having its origin in France, and in the presumed personal and dynastic necessities of the Emperor, that led Great Britain to consent to a premature pacification. It was felt at the time by many, and is now apparent to many more, that that Peace contained in its bosom the germs of future war; that Turkey is not yet safe—or is safe only for a breathing time; and that Italy, Hungary, Germany, and Scandinavia have vital questions to settle, which cannot be finally settled without an appeal to arms, unless the Emperors of Austria and Russia, and the greater and minor potentates of Germany and Italy, love justice better than power and dominion—or prefer the liberty of their people to the pomp and paraphernalia of their own royalty—which are suppositions not to be indulged in by any sane observer of human life and conduct.

But Great Britain has not expended a hundred millions upon the war without deriving some moral benefit. If she have acquired nothing else she has acquired wisdom, and learned the danger of unpreparedness amid such conflicting and incompatible elements as are scattered broadcast over Continental Europe at the present time. Lulled into undue security by more than forty years of peace, and led away by the specious reasoning of prophets who emerged from the counting-house and the shop to bewilder her judgment and pander to her mere commercial instincts, she neglected those armies and navies by whose might and heroism at the commencement of the century she was enabled to take and to keep the lead in Europe, and to grow in wealth, in power, and in civilisation But the war has opened her eyes to the degrading selfishness, no less than to the danger, of such a policy. The British people are not, at present, under the weight of the same error. They can see the uncertainties and the perils of European politics; and they know that it is the duty of those who love their country, and would maintain it now, as ever, in the foremost rank of the world, to keep an efficient force, both naval and military, that, come what will, and when it will, Great Britain may either stand aloof in dignified isolation, and so be enabled to act the part of a strong and effective mediator, or take such share in the conflict as may befit her glory and her interest. The sword is not yet turned into a pruning-hook. It has been replaced in the scabbard, but it is still a sword, and ready for use at an emergency. We hope the emergency will not arise; but Great Britain, in rewarding and honouring her heroes, and in keeping up the due supply of them, will certainly not expedite, but may very possible retard, a conflict which is otherwise inevitable.

AMERICAN OFFICERS AND MARINES' OF THE UNITED STATES' FRIGATE "SUSQUEHANNA."

We have engraved upon the preceding page a group of American Officers and Marines of the Susquehanna frigate, Captain Joshua Sands—the vessel selected to accompany the Niagara as consort, to render her any assistance that she may require during the process of laying down the electric cable between this country and America.

The go-a-head principle of the Americans does not seem to have extended to the Army and Navy in their uniforms. The Marine (the second figure) is a complete revival of the old Foot Guard. The shako is black, with a ball composed of blue and red on top, brass chin-straps, with an ornament, an eagle and anchor, in front. Dark blue coat, with yellow cord epaulets, the cross-belts lower down than usual. The undress (the first figure) appears to be a very sensible working-dress. It is composed of a light blue jacket and trousers, with dark blue cloth cap.

The third figure is in the uniform of a Captain of the American Navy: cocked hat, with gold ornamental side, edged with black silk ribbon; dark blue coat, with gold epaulets; three gold stripes on cuff of coat, white or blue trousers with gold stripe.

The fourth figure is a Lieutenant in full dress: dark blue uniform, with one stripe on the cuff of coat.

The fifth figure is that of a Lieutenant in undress uniform: dark blue frock-coat and trousers, with cloth cap; with gold stripe ornament in front of cap, composed of laurel leaves and an anchor.

The sixth figure is a Passed Midshipman, equal to a Mate in our service. Uniform: cocked hat, with dark blue dress.

It will well repay our readers to pay a visit to the Susquehanna or Niagara steam-ships. With the requisite introduction, they are sure to meet with every attention from the officers of the ship, who show, and minutely explain, every portion of their vessels with an amount of patience that is extremely praiseworthy.

It will be recollected that the Susquehanna was the first vessel to salute the Grand Duke Constantine on his arrival in England. The Osborne neared her at 12.55 on the 19th ult., when Captain Sands immediately beat to quarters, manned yards, and saluted with twenty-one guns in splendid style. In order to give the Grand Duke an opportunity of seeing this fine frigate, the Osborne steamed very slowly past her, so that his Imperial Highness had then a good view of one of the best and heaviest-armed paddle war-steamers afloat. While saluting, the Russian flag was run up at the main, and the band on deck played the Russian National Anthem.

At the Central Criminal Court, on Thursday, Robert Robinson Fripp was charged with the wilful murder of James Scott, at Pentonville, on the 7th of April last. The jury returned a verdict of "Manslaughter," and the prisoner was sentenced to eight years' penal servitude.—Charles Melbourne was committed for wantonly shooting at William Murrel, a policeman (the particulars of the case were given last week); and sentenced to be "transported beyond the seas for the term of his natural life."—John Bruce, who was found guilty of feloniously throwing upon Thomas Robinson a quantity of vitriol, was transported for fifteen years.

Mr. John Locke, M.P., the City Pleader, and Mr. R. Lush, both of the Home Circuit, are about to be called within the bar on receiving the rank of Queen's Counsel.

THE LATE ACCIDENT AND LOSS OF LIFE AT LEGHORN.—The Monitore Toscano of the 13th inst. gives some further particulars of the disaster which occurred at Leghorn on the 9th. Upwards of 3000 spectators had flocked to that day attracted to the Teatro degli Acquedotti, outside the Porta Leopoldo, by the announcement of a grand performance, entitled the "Taking of Sebastopol," with the bombardment of the Malakoff Tower. During the progress of the third act the scene caught fire. The spectators, with loud cries and shrieks, rushed towards the various outlets of the theatre, and the staircases, lobbies, and vestibules became densely packed. The theatre had six doors, which would have given free egress to the crowd if there had been less violence. The number of dead is stated by the Monitore to be sixty two—sixteen of whom were trampled to death in the theatre, the remaining forty-six having expired in the hospital; and the injured amount to eighty-eight. A letter from Florence asserts that the number of deaths exceeds 150, and that the number of the injured is probably double that amount.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

Contrary to general expectation, the elections are becoming animated. It is true that the agitation is as yet confined to the candidates; but the movement seems to be on the increase, and may gain the electors before it stops. The Prefects are doing their best to stir up the Mayors, and the Mayors do their best to rouse the ardour of the peasants. Electioneering addresses on the part of the Government candidates are abundantly placarded in every district in Paris. The news from the provinces increases in interest, and the number of Opposition candidates augments.

The ratifications of the treaty relative to the Canton of Neufchâtel were exchanged at the Foreign-office at Paris at two o'clock on Tuesday.

The Treaty of Commerce between France and Russia has been signed at St Petersburg.

The preparations for the camp at Chalons are being pushed with much activity, and it is thought that the troops which are to compose it will take possession of their quarters in the middle of July. The troops will comprise twenty-five battalions infantry, twenty-four squadrons cavalry, and twelve batteries of artillery.

The campaign in Algeria does not appear to be quite at an end, for intelligence from that colony of the 10th inst. announces that two important tribes, the Beni-Raguilet and Beni-Yenat, have commenced throwing up earthworks with the view of opposing the advance of the French into the interior. Marshal Randon intended marching against the "rebels" as they are pleasantly called as soon as the military road, on which the whole army is at work, shall have been terminated. In two days the troops constructed 12½ miles of road, and it was expected that operations would commence on Thursday or Friday

The "Exhibition of Works of Living Artists" opened at Paris on Monday, in the "Palace of Industry," and attracted a considerable crowd of visitors. The Emperor and Empress paid a private visit to the Palace in the afternoon, and examined the principal paintings with much attention.

BELGIUM.

A report to the King, dated "Brussels, June 12," upon the recent events, states how all the Ministers recommend his Majesty to close the Legislative Session of 1856-57. Such a measure, says the report, will suspend the discussion of the Bill for Charitable Institutions, and adjourn it to next Session. In reply thereto the King has addressed a letter to the Minister of the Interior, in which he fully accedes to the wish expressed in the report for closing the Session; only, in his moderation to all classes, and openness a hope that the majority of the Chamber will pronounce the discussion of the bill. The Legislative Session of 1856-57 is closed.

SPAIN.

The Madrid journals of the 12th inst. state the Senate had commenced the discussion of the bill on the reform of the constitution. General Sancho had spoken against it. In the Chamber of Deputies the report of the committee on the bill on the press had been brought up, and several deputies at once gave notice of their intention to speak against the measure.

Marshal Espartero, in reply to the electors of Barcelona has declined to become a candidate at the approaching election for that city.

PORTUGAL

On the 6th inst. a Cabinet Council deliberated upon the important subject of the marriage of Dom Pedro V., and on the following day a Royal message was delivered to both Chambers of the Cortes by the Marquis de Soule, to the effect that he was charged by his Majesty to communicate that the time had arrived for choosing a Royal consort, that the negotiations for this purpose were now in a forward state, and that he could assure the Peers and Deputies that the choice had fallen upon a Princess in every way worthy to become Queen of Portugal. In both Chambers the Royal message was received with applause and demonstrations of general satisfaction.

The Diario do Governo has officially published the project of law, and the contract provisionally concluded with Sir Morton Peto, for the construction of the Oporto Railway.

DENMARK AND THE GERMAN POWERS

The Privy Council of the States assembled on Wednesday (last week) at the Castle of Jagerprus, and accepted the draught of a reply to the Germanic Powers, which contains a refusal to agree to their pretensions A note to this effect, said to be couched in very firm language, has been sent from Copenhagen to Berlin and Vienna.

RUSSIA

The baptism of the young Grand Duke Sergius took place on the 8th inst. in the chapel of the Palace of Tsarskoe Selo. The members of the diplomatic body, the high clergy, and the principal State dignitaries were present. The Russian ladies wore the national costume, and the men were in grand uniform. The Emperor and the Imperial family went in procession, preceded and followed by the officers of the household from their private apartments to the chapel, the Imperial infant being carried to the font on a cushion by the Princess Sollykoff, Lady of Honour, the Grand Chamberlain, Count Rehbinder pierre, and the Aide-de-Camp, General Prince Orloff, supporting the cushion. At the entrance to the chapel the Emperor was received by the Metropolitan of St. Petersburg and his attendant clergy, who presented the holy water. The godfathers and godmothers were the Empress Dowager, the Grand Duke of Hesse, the Grand Dukes Nicholas and Michael, the Grand Duchess Mary of Saxe-Weimar, and the Queen Dowager of the Netherlands. After the ceremony a "Te Deum" was chanted, amid the ringing of bells and the roaring of cannon. A dinner of upwards of seven hundred covers was served at five o'clock, the foreign Ministers being present at it. In the evening St. Petersburg and the town of Tsarskoe Selo were illuminated.

THE DANUBIAN PRINCIPALITIES.

The labours of the international commission (writes a Bucharest correspondent on the 5th) have at length commenced. They met two days back and decided that the Presidency should be exercised in turns Savfer Effendi, the Turkish Commissary, is President for the present month.

AMERICA.

The United States' mail steam-ship Columbia arrived at Liverpool on Thursday morning, with advices from New York to the 9th inst.

A disgraceful riot occurred at the election in Washington on the 1st inst. between the citizens and a large number of Baltimore "rowdies," called "Plug-Uglies." The "Plugs" were distinguished by the "Rippers" and "Chunkers" of Washington, a terrible attack was made on the "Anti-Know-Nothing" voters with pistols, bowie-knives, and stones, and they were driven from the polls. The rioters were well armed, and took possession of a piece of artillery, with which they threatened their opponents. Two companies of Marines, placed at the disposal of the Mayor by the President, were ordered to fire upon the mob; the result was that five or six persons were killed, and a great number of others wounded. Later accounts state that the election riot has passed over, and an "indignation meeting," condemnatory of the proceedings of the Mayor, has been held.

A collision has taken place between the State of Ohio and the United States' authorities, arising out of the arrest, by the Deputy United States' Marshal, of four persons in Mechanicsburgh, Champaign county, in that State, charged with harbouring fugitive slaves nine months ago. A writ of habeas corpus was taken out, but before it could be served the United States' officers, with their prisoners, were beyond the bounds of the county. Another writ was taken out in Green county, and served by the Sheriff, assisted by a large number of citizens. After considerable resistance, in which several shots were exchanged, the United States' officers with their prisoners, were brought to Springfield, where they are to be tried for resisting the Sheriff in the discharge of his duty. Judge Leavitt, the United States' district Judge, issued a writ of habeas corpus, and the Marshal has gone to Springfield to serve it. In case resistance is offered it is reported that the United States' troops will be called out. It is stated that Mr Buchanan assumes all the responsibility in the case, and has resolved that the Marshal to be prompt and decided, and he would be supported by the whole power of the Government.

The steamer Louisiana was destroyed by fire at Galveston: eleven persons were killed and thirty-one are missing.

Governor Walker arrived in Lecompton on the 27th ult. He was received very quietly. He read his inaugural address, in which he declares that the territorial laws shall be enforced; criticises the action of Free-Staterism, and asserts that the position taken shall be maintained by the whole force of the Government.

The Washington correspondent of the New York Herald writes that the President has fixed upon a Governor for Utah, and that the nominee has indicated his readiness to accept; no name is given. It is said that the policy to be pursued is for the Governor, after reaching Utah, to issue a proclamation that such persons, residing in the territory, male or female, as desire to return to the States, shall receive protection and necessary assistance from the Government.

From private letters received from Salt Lake it appears that the schism in the Mormon Church has assumed a formidable character. The Gladiators, or apostates from the Simon Purefaith, announciated by Brigham Young and his adherents, have of late wonderfully increased their numbers, and grown so rebellious that the Prophet is forced to environ himself with a trusty guard of the faithful. The letters state that his house is guarded night and day by his friends, and that, so bitter are his enemies against him, that he is afraid to show himself in public. He has deserted the Tabernacle. The rumour of his flight is not confirmed. The Mormons of Carson Valley, on account of difficulties apprehended with their Gentile neighbours, had been peremptorily ordered to Salt Lake by the Prophet; but, thinking it easier to negotiate a peace than to sacrifice their homes, they have shaken hands with the Amalekites, and buried the tomahawk. The Leavenworth Herald of the 18th ult. states that great excitement existed among the Mormons, and numerous outrages were committed by them. Brigham Young was driving all the Gentiles away. Judge Soles, the United States' Marshal, and the Surveyor-General, with their families, together with a large number of emigrants, had already left, and others were hurrying away.

The Filibuster expedition in Central America has at length been brought to a close. General Walker capitulated on the 1st of May to Captain Davis, of the United States' sloop-of-war St. Mary's, and with his staff and 200 men, the remnants of his army, was taken to Panama by the St. Mary's. At New Orleans, and at other towns in the southern states, Walker has been received with triumphal honours; and attempts are being made to fit out another expedition for him. Great rejoicing has taken place at Costa Rica, and the Republic had made arrangements to send the defeated Filibusters to the United States. President Mora had issued a proclamation announcing the close of the war, and counselled integrity and union among themselves It is understood that a treaty has been concluded between Costa Rica and Nicaragua, providing for the speedy resumption of trade over the transit

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS the General Commanding-in-Chief held a levee on Friday (yesterday).

HER MAJESTY has been pleased to command that a Council of Education be appointed to superintend the system of the education of the officers of the army and the examinations of candidates for admission to the service, and that the following officers shall compose the council:—The General Commanding in Chief, ex officio. Vice-President Colonel Duncan A. Cameron, half-pay 42nd Foot, with the temporary rank of Major-General. Members—Colonel Joseph Ellison Portlock, Royal Engineers; Captain and Brevet Lieutenant-Colonel Joseph Edward Addison, unattached.

TROOPS AND STORES FOR CHINA.—Portsmouth Dockyard is now a scene of extraordinary activity. Soon after seven o'clock on Tuesday morning the gallant 93rd Highlanders marched through the dockyard and embarked from the jetty on board the Mauritius, No. 5, chartered iron screw troop-ship, Captain Cruickshanks They were heartily cheered throughout the distance from the barrack to the gates. The Mauritius sailed for China on Wednesday. On Tuesday afternoon the 33rd Royal Duke's marched into the dockyard, and were conveyed in the Echo, steam-tug, alongside the Cleopatra, iron screw chartered transport, Captain Brown, for passage to China. This distinguished regiment was cheered by the assembled multitude, with many a wish for their safe voyage. The Cleopatra sailed also on Wednesday evening for China. The Princess Charlotte, 104, sailing three-decker, Captain George St. Vincent King, has all but completed taking in her provisions and an immense quantity of stores and munitions of war for China. It is expected she will go out of harbour on Saturday (to-day), and anchor at Spithead, to await final orders. The Melville, hospital-ship, Commander Henry Trollope, has nearly completed taking in provisions and stores, and on Tuesday received a spare screw for the Himalaya. A further portion of the 33rd will embark on Saturday (to-day) on board, when she will proceed to Spithead, and await her final sailing orders for China.

A MEETING of officers of the militia was held in the Music Hall, Abbey-street, Dublin, on Tuesday, for the purpose of making arrangements for bringing the grievances under which they labour as a body before Parliament. Several resolutions in accordance with that object were carried

AN order has been received from the War-office by Colonel H. Jervis, commanding the Provisional Battalion at Chatham, directing that the detachements of the 8th, 32nd, 35th, 53rd, 66th, and 75th Regiments are to be held in immediate readiness for embarkation for India. The officers and men have been inspected by Colonel H. Jervis in heavy marching order.

ON Monday the General Commanding-in-Chief, attended by a numerous staff, reviewed the troops of the garrison at Maidstone, the object being to give the Colonels of the several cavalry regiments in the service an insight into the system of equitation" practised at the depôt, previously to the dismissal of the trained men to their respective regiments.

THE 1st and 2nd battalions of the Scots Fusilier Guards were inspected on Saturday last, in Hyde-park, by his Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief and Staff, for the purpose of minutely examining the new clothing, planned by Colonel F. Seymour, C.B., and supplied by Messrs. S. Isaac, Campbell, and Co. The men looked remarkably well, and appeared to be perfectly at ease in their new tunics.

The range of temperature during the week was 28·2 degrees.

The weather has been generally fine and clear, the only days upon which the sky continued much overcast being those of June 13th and 16th. On the latter day several showers fell, and a few drops of rain were likewise falling on the forenoon of the 17th. The wind has been blowing freshly during the week, particularly on the mornings of the 14th and 16th.

The sky was brilliantly clear on the nights of the 12th, 13th, 14th, and 15th; but no meteors were noticed.

The daily means are obtained from observations made at 6h. and 10h. a.m., and 2h., 6h., and 10h. p.m., on each day, except Sunday, when the first observation is omitted. The corrections for diurnal variation are taken from the Tables of Mr. Glaisher. The "Dew-point" and "Relative Humidity" are calculated, from observations of the dry and wet bulb thermometers, by Dr. Apjohn's Formula and Dalton's Tables of the Tension of Vapour. The movement of the wind is given by a self-recording Robinson's Anemometer, the amount stated for each day being that registered from midnight to midnight.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

The Princess Royal Annuity Bill was read a third time and passed.

The Marquis of CLANRICARDE called attention to the proofs of continued maladministration of justice in the Bengal Presidency, and entered into many details on the subject of Indian government; to which the Duke of ARGYLL replied. Further remarks having been offered on the question by Lord MONTEAGLE and other Peers, the subject dropped.

The Earl of DERBY gave notice that on the order of the day for the second reading of the Bill for the Abolition of Ministers' Money, he should move that it be read a second time that day six months.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

THE OATHS BILL.

The House having gone into Committee on this bill,

Mr. DUNCOMBE moved the insertion of words substituting in the oath the words "I, A. B., do solemnly and sincerely declare." This change, as the hon. member explained, was preliminary to the further amendment, that the formula should be prescribed to members of every religious persuasion, the present oath appointed for Roman Catholics being superseded.

Lord PALMERSTON deprecated the introduction into the bill before the House of collateral questions, certain to provoke religious discussions, and likely to imperil the success of the whole measure. He abstained from expressing any opinion whether the Roman Catholic oath ought to be maintained; opposing the amendment simply on the ground that the proposition it embodied was inopportune.

After some observations by Mr. Drummond, Mr. Walpole, Mr. Roebuck, Sir J. Jervis, Mr. B. Hope, Mr. G. Moore, and Mr. Napier, the amendment was negatived by a majority of 373 to 83.

Mr. ROEBUCK then, without further remark, moved an amendment to insert the words "by law" after the word "spiritual;" his object being clearly to indicate that the absence of any extraneous ecclesiastical authority was merely a legal and not an actual fact.

The Committee divided immediately: For the amendment, 68; against, 24.

Sir J. THESIGER brought forward the amendment of which he had given notice, introducing into the oath a clause comprising the affirmation "on the true faith of a Christian."

Mr. B. Stanhope, Mr. Kinglake, Mr. Wigram, Mr. Evans, and Mr. S. Warren joined in the discussion.

Sir J. PAKINGTON confessed, as he acknowledged, with some pain, that he could no longer defend the exclusion of Jews from Parliament. Fuller examination of the question had forced him to recognise their claim to equal constitutional rights with the rest of their fellow-subjects. His could not, together approve the mode in which the Government had introduced the question, and wished that Christian members of the Legislature had still been allowed to acknowledge their Christianity, but, nevertheless, expressed his readiness to vote for the bill.

Mr. NAPIER reiterated and enforced the arguments on the other side.

Mr. HORSMAN observed that the amendment had been proposed and advocated by lawyers, who viewed the question merely in its theological aspect. No one had dared to vindicate the exclusion of the Jews on legal, political, or constitutional grounds.

Mr. WHITESIDE repeated the assertion that Christianity was interwined with all the institutions of the country from the earliest times, and enlarged upon the destructive consequences that would follow the attempt to sever the connection.

Lord J. RUSSELL argued that the words which prevented Jews from sitting in Parliament were introduced without any such intention, and the exclusive effect was accidental. He controverted the assertion that by conceding just rights to members of the Jewish persuasion the Christian character of the State or of the Legislature would be destroyed.

Mr. NEWDEGATE, in supporting the amendment, expressed his dislike of agitation.

Lord PALMERSTON, after paying a tribute to the courageous honesty of Sir J. Pakington, observed that opponents of Jewish emancipation, by accepting a new form of oath, had surrendered the argument founded on precedent, and, if they still wished to exclude the Jews, could only do so by creating a new disability. This, he contended, was contrary to the principle of civil and religious liberty, and inapplicable to an assembly whose functions were essentially political. As the Dissenters and Catholics had successively been admitted to a full participation in constitutional rights, the Legislature was bound in consistency to abolish the odious exclusion which still existed in the case of the Jews.

On a division there appeared—For the amendment, 201; against, 341.

Some opposition was made to the third reading of the bill, and the Committee divided on a motion for reporting progress by Lord R. CECIL: Ayes, 142; noes, 272.

The bill, after some further conversation, was passed through Committee. The orders of the day were then disposed of.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

The misgovernment of India was again made the subject of discussion, by the Marquis of Clanricarde, whose remarks on the subject elicited rejoinders from the Duke of Argyll and Lord Ellenborough.

REFORMATORY INSTITUTIONS.

The second reading of the Reformatory Institutions Bill was moved by the Earl of CARNARVON.

Lord BROUGHAM criticised the provisions of the measure, and observed that a bill of very similar design had been introduced elsewhere by the Home Secretary. He suggested that the further consideration of the measure should be postponed until both bills could be discussed together.

After some conversation this suggestion was adopted, and the debate adjourned accordingly.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

THE PAPER-DUTY.

On resuming at six o'clock, in reply to Mr. Dillwyn,

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER stated that the usual paper-duty would be charged upon Indian papers, as upon all others, if fit for being written on, and even although unadapted for taking printed impressions.

THE WORKHOUSE SYSTEM IN IRELAND.

Mr. FAGAN moved for a Select Committee to investigate the present state of the Irish workhouse system, together with the laws relating to medical charities and the relief of the sick poor in the sister kingdom.

Mr. H. HERBERT, the new Secretary for Ireland, submitted that ample information on the question was already provided. He warned the House against the risk attending experimental tamperings with the Poor-law system in Ireland, which, he was persuaded, worked regularly and well.

The motion was withdrawn by consent, without further discussion.

POOR-RATES IN THE METROPOLIS.

Mr. AYRTON moved for a Committee "to inquire into the causes of the inequality of the poor-rates in the metropolitan districts, and whether any measures should be adopted to render the rates more equal." The hon. member gave many instances of this inequality, commenting upon the injustice which was inflicted by imposing the heaviest impost upon the poorest parishes, while districts inhabited chiefly by the wealthy classes escaped it much easier rates.

The motion was seconded by Mr. TOWNSEND, who recommended the subject to the attention of Government on the ground that a large proportion of the industrial inhabitants who became chargeable to the eastern metropolitan parishes had been attracted thither by the employment offered in the execution of Government contracts.

Mr. HUME doubted whether the House could afford to appoint another Select Committee. Between private bill committees, select committees, and election committees, the time of at least 400 members was already monopolised, and during the brief residue of the Session there would be no possibility of undertaking any satisfactory investigation of the subject proposed by the motion. On the abstract question Mr. Bouverie remarked that the only cure for the present inequality must be accomplished by the establishment of a uniform metropolitan rate—a measure which, he was convinced, lead to many evils and was much local dissatisfaction.

Also some remarks by Mr. Butler, Mr. Locke, Mr. Knight, and Mr. Malins.

Mr. LABOUCHERE (the Paymaster-General) said that every necessary fact was already known to the House. A valuable work illustrating to the minutest detail the subject was now in the course of preparation; he declared that if the principle of equalisation were once conceded it was impossible to stop short of a national rate. He, for one, was not prepared to adopt that conclusion.

The motion was supported by Mr. BARROW and Mr. SCHNEIDER, as also by Lord H. GROSVENOR, who repudiated the idea of a national rate, but believed that the condition of London was exceptional as regarded the law of settlement, the rating of docks and large mercantile establishments, and other matters, which formed proper subjects for inquiry by a Select Committee.

Mr. AYRTON briefly replied, and the House divided:—For the motion, [illegible] 123.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

A number of petitions were presented in favour of the Industrial Schools Bill, and others for the repeal of the Paper-duty.

The Scotch Registration of Long Leases Bill passed through Committee, with amendments.

INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS.

A lengthened discussion took place in Committee on Mr. Adderley's Industrial Schools Bill, to which several objections were taken first, as to the juvenile offences for which children should be taken from the streets and sent to those schools; next, as to the security which parents were to give in taking their children from the schools; then as to the period during which the children should be kept there. Mr. Adderley met one difficulty after another, postponing some clauses and modifying others. Little progress was made, though the House remained in Committee till the usual time for adjourning contested measures, when the House resumed.

The Grand Juries (Ireland) Act (1856) Amendment Bill was read a third time and passed.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

MINISTERS' MONEY (IRELAND) BILL.

Earl GRANVILLE, in moving the second reading of this bill, said that, although originally introduced into the other House by an independent member, her Majesty's Government had felt it right to adopt it, because, as it had been session after Session before Parliament without success, they thought it exceedingly desirable to put an end to the agitation to which it constantly gave rise. With the support of the Government it had now passed the Lower House by a large majority. The object of the bill was to abolish a tax levied by an old law upon twelve towns in Ireland for the support of Protestant ministers; and in those towns it was the source of continual discord and bad feeling, which, generally speaking, it was found impossible to collect the tax. As a means, therefore, of putting an end to the main cause of religious agitation left in Ireland, as well as of avoiding collision with the other House, he hoped their Lordships would give their assent to the measure.

The Earl of DERBY denounced the bill as being one of the grossest invasions of the rights of property for which the sanction of the Legislature had ever been asked. The tax levied upon the Irish towns was a legal tax, and was a tax upon property like tithes, and, like tithes, ought to be maintained in its integrity. But instead of doing this he was now proposed to abolish the tax, and to make the payments to which it had formerly been applied over to a body which was the Ecclesiastical Commission fund, the property of the Irish Church. It was said that it gave rise to an agitation; but Lord Grey had been able to resist a similar demand made by Mr. O'Connell, with a thousand times more power at his back than the [illegible] party in the House of Commons now possessed. He [illegible] that even the Ministry [illegible] Government [illegible] Lord Dungannon, the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, and the Lord Donoughmore.

The Earl of CORK and Lord TALBOT supported the bill.

The Earl of CLANCARTY would not oppose the second reading of the bill. He thought, however, that under the management of the commissioners great extravagance prevailed in the administration of the Irish Church temporalities, so as to make it almost impossible to meet the demands which the abolition of ministers' money would bring upon them. He should, therefore, when in Committee, propose to transfer the fund to the management of the Irish Board of Works, by which means greater economy would be secured, and a surplus provided to meet the new demands.

The Duke of NEWCASTLE urged the necessity of passing the measure, which must inevitably be yielded sooner or later. As a measure for sweeping away the last elements of religious discord in Ireland he gave his support to the bill, although he did not do so without some reluctance.

Lord CAMPBELL also supported the bill; and after a few words from Earl Granville in reply, and Lord Derby in explanation, the House divided—For the second reading, contents, 101; non-contents, 96: majority in favour of the second reading, 5.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

On the motion of Mr. HATTER, a new writ was granted for Banbshire, in the room of the Earl of Hillsborough, called to the Chiltern Hundreds.

Mr. HARDCASTLE gave notice that on Monday next he would move for leave to bring in a bill for the incorporation of public charities.

SAVINGS BANKS.

In answer to a question by Viscount GODERICH, the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said that in the event of the bill passing into law he would consent to the appointment of a Committee next Session to consider the whole state of the law.

MILITARY DEPARTMENTS.

On the bringing up the report on Supply,

General PEEL called the attention of the House to portions of the evidence taken before the Sebastopol Committee and the Chelsea Commission, showing the necessity of defining the responsibility and duties of the various departments. The gallant General contended that the army towards the close of the war was so overwhelmed with articles that if a march had been ordered three days of the same must have been left behind. It was a great evil that one department should be dependent upon another for the execution of duties for which it was responsible, and this was especially shown in the case of the Quarter-General's department. The gallant officer read lengthened extracts from the evidence of Sir Richard Airey and others, taken before the Sebastopol and Chelsea Committees, showing that there was a want of organisation, and that a change in the general system, which related to the wants of the army, was indispensable.

Mr. E. ELLICE and Sir J. PAKINGTON, who had been members of the Sebastopol Committee, bore testimony to the entire confusion which prevailed in all the departments at the beginning of the last war.

Sir W. CODRINGTON thought that all appointments should be left to the Commander-in-Chief, and that he should be held to that responsibility.

Lord PALMERSTON said many of the defects which existed at the beginning of the last war were remedied before its conclusion, and arose principally from the fact that the Secretary for War had at that time a new department to create. But since that time the two departments had been combined, by which means a simplification of administration had been arrived at, which tended very much to the efficiency of the service. The Secretary of State was responsible for everything political and every thing financial; and the Commander-in-Chief for everything connected with discipline and promotion. When the latter officer wished to introduce any improvement he communicated with the former, and nothing could be more harmonious than the working of the system between the two. Lord Panmure had also established a separate store-keeping department, which alone would prevent the recurrence of many of the evils complained of in the Crimea, and was president of a council appointed to frame a plan for the education of officers from which further beneficial results might be anticipated. There was every desire on the part of the Government to give the necessary information on the subject, but at the same time it was rather inconvenient to discuss matters connected with the discipline of the army in that House.

After some further discussion, in which Mr. Stafford, Colonel Gilpin, Lord Naas, Sir De L. Evans, and others took part, the subject dropped.

THE ORDNANCE SURVEY (SCOTLAND).

Sir D. NORREYS moved that the survey of Scotland, on the scale of twenty-five inches to the mile, be discontinued, and that it should be carried on as it had been in Ireland, in the northern portion of England, and in a large portion of Scotland on a scale six inches to one mile; and that a map of Scotland, on a scale of one inch to the mile, be also reduced from the six-inch map for engraving and publication. He contended that the larger scale was rather suited to the requirements of private landowners than those of a national survey, and would entail a heavy expense upon the country without bringing any corresponding advantages. That expense would be about £1,000,000 or £5,000,000, being at least double the amount which the smaller and equally efficient scale would cost.

As the forms of the House would not permit the amendment to be put in the shape proposed, Sir D. NORREYS moved that the vote be reduced from £151,744 to £115,744.

A prolonged discussion then took place, in the course of which Lord PALMERSTON reminded the House of the vast amount of money that had been thrown away in the attempt to effect a survey on a small scale for England. He urged the importance of non-interference in the present scale of the survey of Scotland, which had given great satisfaction throughout the country; the only saving that could be effected by the proposed change being about £10,000 or £15,000 at the most.

The House having divided, the numbers were:—For Sir D. Norreys' amendment, 172; against it, 162: majority against the Government, 10.

The announcement of the numbers was received with great cheering.

The SPEAKER having put the question that the sum of £115,744 be granted for the survey in Scotland,

Mr. BLACKBURN moved as an amendment that the vote be further reduced to £91,000.

Another division took place, when the numbers were:—For Mr. Blackburn's amendment, 21; against, 290: majority against the amendment, 268. The vote was then agreed to.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—FRIDAY.

The Transportation Bill, after considerable discussion, was read a third time and passed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY.

ADULTERATION OF FOOD.—Mr. SCHOLEFIELD gave notice that on Thursday next he would ask leave to bring in a bill to prevent the adulteration of articles of food.

NEW PUBLIC OFFICES.

Sir BENJAMIN HALL, in reply to Lord Elcho and Lord John Manners, on the subject of the designs for the new public offices, said it would be impossible to reopen the exhibition of those designs generally in Westminster Hall to the public. He proposed, however, to have the models for the Wellington monument placed upon tables in the centre of the hall; and the successful designs, to which prizes would be awarded, upon the surrounding walls, for public inspection. With regard to the award of the judges he had every reason to believe that it would be delivered on the 25th inst.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

General THOMPSON presented a petition from John Newall, parliamentary agent, complaining that Abraham Rothwell, an important witness in the Rochdale election petition case, had been offered £50 by a Mr. Johnston to go to New Orleans; and praying that the House would take such steps in the matter as they might deem fit.

The petition having been read at the bar,

General THOMPSON moved that the petitioner should be called to the bar.

The motion having been agreed to, John Newall appeared at the bar

The SPEAKER: You state Abraham Rothwell is an important witness on the Rochdale election petition?—Witness: He is.

The SPEAKER: You state that Abraham Rothwell has informed you that last evening he was offered £50 to go to New Orleans to prevent him from giving evidence before the Committee?—Witness: He did so.

The SPEAKER: You may withdraw.

Lord PALMERSTON: I wish to ask the witness a question. Did Rothwell say anything as to the answer which he made? Witness: He said that he was dissatisfied with the offer, and that he thought £1.00 was little enough (Laughter.) If you will allow me I will read from a paper signed by him an account of what took place.

The witness having read a few lines, he was ordered to withdraw, and Abraham Rothwell was called.

A recently-dressed working-man then appeared at the bar

The SPEAKER: Abraham Rothwell, where do you live?—Witness: In Rochdale.

The SPEAKER: Have you received a warrant to attend the Rochdale Election Committee?—Witness: Yes.

SPEAKER: Has anything occurred to you in connection with that warrant?—Witness: Yes.

SPEAKER: State what occurred. The witness then, in reply to various questions put to him, said that on Thursday night he met a man whom he knew by the name of John Lord, with whom he went to have a glass of ale, when Lord [illegible] him [illegible] from Rochdale [illegible] to see him; and afterwards took him to the Falcon Tavern, in Fleet-street, where he introduced him to Peter Johnston, who offered him £50 and an outfit to go to Orleans, which he objected to as insufficient; and, after agreeing "to think over it," he visited Johnston upon an arrangement to meet him again at nine o'clock that night at a certain place. The witness supposed that the offer was to get him out of the way of the Committee, as he had taken money on the 5th of December from Sir A. Ramsay's electioneers; and, in consequence of being continually [illegible] he [illegible], and left Rochdale to get out of the way. [illegible] Loudon, where he had obtained work as a [illegible]. The witness after that statement withdrew.

Lord PALMERSTON moved that Peter Johnston should be ordered to attend the bar of that House forthwith.

The motion having been agreed to unanimously, the House proceeded to the orders of the day.

THE BOMBARDMENT OF GREYTOWN.

On the motion for going into Committee of Supply, Lord C. HAMILTON asked the First Lord of the Treasury what steps her Majesty's Government had taken to obtain compensation for the British subjects residing at Greytown whose property was destroyed when that town was bombarded in 1854; and if he would lay upon the table of the House copies of the communications that had taken place on that subject with the Government of the United States? The noble Lord acquitted the Government of the United States of all cognisance of the transaction, which he charged upon the officers of the Transit Company, the representatives of the United States being a partisan in the matter.

Lord PALMERSTON said the conduct of the American Government was highly blameable in the affair, and that of their officer, Captain Hollins, barbarous in the extreme; but having taken the advice of the law officers of the Crown it was decided that there were principles of international law which effectually prevented the interference of the British Government in the United States' courts. Legal proceedings ensued, the citizens of other States who might be in a place attacked must take their chance. It was true Greytown was under British protection, but, although that fact would prevent invasion by a foreign Power, it could not avail in a case like the present.

Lord LOVAINE said the outrage had been committed upon the British flag, which was flying from the house of the Vice-Consul, for which no proper reparation had been made.

Mr. ROEBUCK held it to be the duty of the British Government to interfere in such a case, and more especially as ever there was a case of tyranny towards the weak, and subserviency towards the strong, it was that under consideration.

The attorney-GENERAL vindicated the opinion of the law officers of the Crown that, on principles of international law, the British Government could not interfere.

Mr. DISRAELI denounced such a doctrine in the strongest terms, and said that the outrage upon Greytown was most atrocious and disgraceful.

Lord J. RUSSELL thought that the British Government, under the circumstances, could not demand compensation.

The subject then dropped.

The House having gone into Committee of Supply upon the Civil Service Estimates, the remainder of the night was occupied by a consideration of the votes.

GENERAL WALKER'S FILIBUSTERING EXPEDITION.

AFTER many vicissitudes, the eventful and sanguinary adventures of the renowned Filibuster chief have been—for the present, at least—brought to a close. General Walker, with his Staff and 280 men (the remains of his army), surrendered on the 1st of May to Captain Davis, of the United States' sloop-of-war St. Mary's.

We have been favoured by a Correspondent with the accompanying Sketch of the harbour of Greytown, with the squadron, and the following intelligence:—

April 10th.—After repeated attempts to open a communication with General Walker, Colonel Lockridge and his men have been forced to retreat to Greytown harbour: having given up all hopes of succeeding in their enterprise, they are now encamped on Point Arenas, a long sandy spit of ground, which forms the north side of the harbour of Greytown. They are not allowed to go over to the town, as they would be sure to create disturbances, and our boats are constantly on the alert to prevent them. This makes the evil-disposed very savage against us; hitherto, however, we are grateful for the kindness that has been shown to their sick and wounded; the medical men of the squadron, especially Dr. Duncan, of the Cossack, having been most kind and attentive to them; many among them being severely wounded, and others dreadfully scalded when one of their river steamers blew up the other day.

April 15th.—The American steamer, which left here on the 6th, refused to take any of them away; and, orders having come to break up the Greytown station, we are now reduced to the necessity of having a number of idle men in Greytown, where they are very deservedly hated. The senior officer has, therefore, ordered the Cossack and Tartar to take them to Aspinwall, whence they will get sent to the states. We left Greytown this morning with nearly 400 on board, divided between the two ship.

April 17th.—Arrived at Aspinwall this morning; and the American steamers positively refuse to take any of them, and they will not allow us to land them here. Captain Dunlop is gone to Panama, to see the agent of the steamers about it.

April 21st.—The Cossack's lot of Filibusters were allowed to go in the U.S. mail-steamer Grenada to New Orleans last night; but, as the measles have broken out among our Tartar's Filibusters, they will not take them, and the Tartar proceeds immediately to Pensecola, in the United States, to land them there.

Our Correspondent has also sent a View of the British Consulate at Greytown. It is a primitive abode, thatched with palmetto-leaves; on one side of the door is the "latter-box."

Captain Davis, of the St. Mary's, which for some time past had been lying at San Juan del Sur, having ascertained from his own observations, as well as from the accounts brought in by deserters, of the straits to which Walker and his men were reduced, addressed a letter to Walker on the 30th of April, stating that he was aware of his desperate and forlorn position, and offered, from humanity, to intervene in his behalf; and stated that he was authorised, in case of his (Walker's) capitulation, to guarantee his personal safety and the safe removal of all under his command. He also offered to take Walker to Panama in the St. Mary's, and stated that General Mora consented to suspend hostilities. The same day Walker sent a reply, stating that he agreed to suspend hostilities, and appointed General Henningsen and Colonel Waters as commissioners to negotiate with Captain Davis. The next day, May 1 terms were agreed to, and Walker issued them in a general order, concluding with these words:—

In parting for the present with the brave command who have adhered to our cause through evil as well as good report, the Commander-in-Chief desires to return his deep and [illegible] to the officers and soldiers under his command. He [illegible] to our present position by the cowardice of some, the incapacity of others, and the treachery of many, the army has yet written a page of American history which it is impossible to forget or erase From the future, if not from the present, we may expect just judgment,

At New Orleans, and at other large towns in the Southern States, Gen. Walker has been received with great honours; and his friends confidently assert that he will go back to Nicaragua in less than sixty days with abundance of men and means.

A salute of 100 guns announced to the people of San José the surrender of the Filibusters. The ringing of bells music, and cries of rejoicing manifested the enthusiasm of the people for the victors and for the re-establishment of peace. The towns and villages were illuminated during the night. Everywhere there were music, fireworks, promenades, balls, and merry reunions, and the national flag waving over all houses.

The President of the Costa Rican Republic subsequently issued a proclamation, in which he states —

Fellow-countrymen,- The war is ended. Beloved peace comes back to us with the conquerors of Filibusterism We have long striven, with union and constancy, for the most holy rights. God has given us the victory There are no longer Filibusters in Central America. The few hundred of them that exist, unarmed and surrendered, are under the sanctity of our protection and clemency.

The following abridgment of the statistics of Walker's campaign in Central America (which may be divided into three periods) is taken from a detailed account by Gen. Henningsen, Walker's comrade in arms —

The first period may be computed from the 29th January, 1855, to the 11th of April, 1856, comprising nine months, during which time Walker fought against 4000 men; viz 1800 servilee, 3000 Costa Ricans The result left him master of the whole territory of Nicaragua, after a loss to the enemy in round numbers of 1800 killed and wounded, and 200 to his own forces.

The second period may be reckoned from 1st September, 1856, to December 12th of the same year, terminating with the siege of Granada. During this time he had to contend against about 7000 men of the native and allied forces, the result being a loss of 311 killed and wounded on his part, and that of over 2700 killed and wounded on the part of the enemy At the end of December the hostile force was reduced to 1600 men, who were being thinned every day by desertion. In fact, but for the capture of the lake and river steamers, through English interference, the war might have been considered virtually ended

The third period may be reckoned from the 25th of January, 1857, to the 1st of May, 1857, which terminated the siege of Rivas, and during which time Walker had contended against over 5000 of the enemy, with a loss to his force of 300 killed and wounded, and between 2500 and 3000 to that of the allies

The force of Walker, from the time of his landing in Nicaragua to the 1st of May, 1857—a space of nearly two years exclusive of Lockridge's force, was 2518. The total force of the allies, exclusive of 1200 Costa Ricans said to have been on the river, was 17 000 Of this number 11,500 men were from Guatemala, Costa Rica, Honduras, and Salvador The total killed and wounded of Walker's force was about 850. The total of allies killed and wounded, 5468

This is without counting on either side those who died of disease The mortality in the enemy's camp was very great Two Generals died at the siege of Granada; and in April, 1856, of 2403 men who retreated from Rivas with Mora, at least 1000 died of cholera, only 800 entering San Jose with him.

To this force of 2518 the total force Walker had under arms during two years since his landing in the country it is hardly necessary to add the armed citizens who fought at Granada and Rivas, because they were, with a score of exceptions, disbanded soldiers, and it must be borne in mind that, if many unwounded died, a large proportion of the wounded recovered

It is estimated that, during two years, of 2550 enlisted or holding commissions, about 1000 were killed or died of wounds or sickness, 700 deserted, 250 were discharged, 430 were at Rivas on the 1st of May, and 80 in garrison or on steamers on the river. Total, 2465 – leaving 53 unaccounted for

It will be perceived that this has been no ordinary contest, either as regards the obstinacy with which Walker's men fought, or the odds against which they were pitted, and to enable the reader to discern that this has been no holiday work it will suffice to point out that, in proportion to the number engaged, the loss of the Americans in this war in Nicaragua averages more than double the number lost in the battles of Mexico by Taylor or Scott, and that Walker's men were engaged against an average of more than double the disparity of force which the United States' armies had to struggle against in Mexico.

THE BRITISH CONSULATE, AT GREYTOWN.

CAPTURE OF A SLAVER.

KINGSTON, JAMAICA, May 11, 1857.

By the last mail, intelligence was forwarded from this place to England of an unusual and startling occurrence off the coast of Cuba—viz., the capture of a slaver, with a large cargo of slaves on board. I send you some photographs, that I took a few days ago, of these ill-treated African youths, who have been so cruelly torn from their native country. I also send a photograph of the little craft that bore them across the great Atlantic, these being illustrative proofs of the fearful reality that the African slave trade still exists in all its unabated horrors.

Owing to the high prices of colonial produce prevailing of late, this vile traffic has taken a fresh start, and is likely to continue to increase unless the most vigorous efforts are at once made for its suppression. The public mind had been somewhat quieted by the statements of gentlemen in high official positions to the effect that this abominable trade had well-nigh ceased, especially in regard to the island of Cuba; but the recent capture of a slaver by a British cruiser dispels at once such an erroneous notion, and discloses to us the melancholy truth that the full machinery of this wicked system is in active operation at this moment; that those heart-rending scenes, so often and so graphically narrated by philanthropic men, of midnight descents upon unsuspecting villagers, of the slaughter that ensues in the kidnapping struggle, the conflagrations, the pestiferous hardships of the barracoons, and that horror of horrors, the middle passage, terminating in that terrible wind up to all of hopeless bondage of the worst description,—are still being enacted with daring effrontery. The case just brought to light clearly shows, as may be seen in the particulars of the capture, that this is by no means a rare or unusual occurrence; but, on the contrary, that in all probability about two vessels on an average depart weekly from the coast of Africa, with from 500 to 700 slaves on board; and there is ample evidence to warrant the belief that, for this one slaver caught, ninety-nine arrive at the ports, land their wretched freight, pocket the doubloons, and consign their victims to a life of suffering.

It would be well if the British public would ponder these startling and incontrovertible facts, remembering, at the same time, that the above case is but a fair sample of what is going on every day on the coast of Africa, the Atlantic, and the West Indies. Let the reader picture to himself the little schooner here represented, of scarce 140 tons, loading in some quiet African bay; mark her dimensions closely; and then watch her crew busily at work stowing away in that limited hold (57 feet by 15 feet average breadth, and 3 feet high) some five hundred human beings, upwards of forty of whom are females! The sad group of boys in the Engraving tells how they were packed—like so many bales of goods, closely wedged in!

Her anchor is up, the wind seems propitious, and she is off to sea with her five hundred stowed below. Night has now closed around the schooner, as she begins to roll on the mountain waves of the Atlantic—that dread first night, when the poor captives become fully alive to the awfulness of their situation; when sea-sickness seizes them, and multiplies their agonies tenfold. But they must remain in their dark chamber, breathing the hot and suffocating air the whole night long, with their limbs doubled up in the manner shown in the Illustration. Should sleep afford them a short respite from their miseries, all they can do is to fall on their sides, and so remain huddled together in a thick mass, the heads of one row resting on the hips of the next.

As might be expected, such treatment proves too severe for some of the weaker constitutions; but their agonising groans and piercing cries of anguish and despair are unheeded; many sink, they die—unpitied, uncared for—and in the morning are weeded out to become food for the fishes of the ocean. Daily and nightly, for several weeks, this dreadful mortality is continued, so that by the time the vessel is off the coast of Cuba upwards of 130 victims have been committed to the deep, where they find rest from their merciless oppressors. But the calculation has been made that, although a certain portion of the cargo may perish in the transportation, as one of the common casualties of business, yet enough remains to realise a handsome return on the investment.

But the diabolical scheme is to be frustrated. The winds are not favourable; and it was decreed that Jamaica and not Cuba should be the home of those bewildered strangers.

The pinnace of the Arab was rapidly gaining upon the slaver, and there was every prospect of a speedy capture, which the slave captain perceiving, he prepared to escape with his crew in the boat; but before he left his ill-fated schooner, he lashed the helm of the vessel, while all the sails were set, so as to run her full on to the reefs close by, and thus to accomplish, if possible, the destruction not only of the vessel, but of the whole remaining 370 human beings on board.

But the schooner was captured and brought to Port Royal, where the captain openly boasted of his numerous slave-trade exploits, having made, it is said, some twenty-seven trips across the Atlantic with slaves, during which period he had been captured three times. He is stated to have amassed a considerable amount of gold, and was very impatient to return to Havannah, where another vessel was waiting for him to go on with his vile traffic.

The captured slaves, on their arrival in the harbour of Kingston were landed at Fort Augusta, and every attention paid to their comfort; but several were so completely exhausted during the fearful middle passage that they have since died. Many sympathising persons visited the survivors frequently, that they might be themselves eye-witnesses of a veritable cargo of human slaves (a sight quite new to many here) just landed in all their degradation and misery. One of the first questions that occurs to most people, after they have inspected this human cargo, is—why does not the British Government put a stop to the traffic? This is, indeed, a natural question, considering all the circumstances, and it is to be hoped that the time is not far distant when the British people will press it to a satisfactory solution. It cannot be that we have not the power. Surely the country whose navy commands every ocean and sea is able to put a stop to the piratical depredations of such puny powers as Spain and Brazil. Great Britain has the most direct, and what might be styled a legal, claim or right, as everybody knows, to interfere with the African slave trade, in the shape of special treaty with Spain—in the ratification of which, if I mistake not, England paid a large sum of money to Spain as a sort of compensation for its abolition. Why, then, is this right not urged, and are not proper measures adopted at once to ensure full compliance with the provisions of the said treaty? True, efforts are, and have been, made from time to time in this direction; but they are so notoriously feeble as to be of little avail. J. S.

The following details of the capture are abridged from the Colonial Standard and Jamaica Dispatch:—

On Sunday, the 12th of April, the pinnace of H.M. brig Arab, under the command of Lieutenant Stubbs, R.N., after a search of ten days in and about the keys on the south side of Cuba, succeeded in capturing a schooner of 150 tons, name and nation unknown, together with 370 slaves, survivors of 503, shipped at Bahunda, on the coast of Africa, and destined for disposal in Cuba. The circumstances of the capture are these.

On the 2nd of April the pinnace left the Arab off Trinidad de Cuba, in command of Lieutenant Stubbs, a marine, and fifteen men, on a cruise. On the 4th, about half-past one o'clock, the pinnace anchored in Boca Grande, where she found a Caymanas schooner, the Star, Captain [illegible], who informed Lieutenant Stubbs that there were three hundred slaves on the south side of Cuba, secreted in the keys, from which Captain McLauchlan had obtained a small quantity of copper, about one and a half miles east of Cape Breton; the slavers, the Captain stated, had been on shore for about two months. He also stated that on Cotton Keys he saw a wreck, and the lifeless bodies of about twenty Africans; eight men calling themselves fishermen, but evidently pilots, were on the west point of Cay Grande; some of whom he knew, and informed him that they expected vessel with Africans to arrive daily. After this information the pinnace cruised in the vicinity of Boca Grande, and returned. Captain McLauchlan then further informed Lieutenant Stubbs that these pilots were on the look out there incessantly, he also stated to [illegible] that a vessel was to be laid up and as the captain had [illegible] and [illegible] of the pinnace should be caught [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] parishes is not, practically, an abuse of a good principle; a mistake as well as an injustice. We pass no present opinion on the subject. What is needed is inquiry; and we think the Government is not only wrong in having refused such inquiry, but unfortunate in the excuses—we cannot call them reasons—which, through the mouth of Mr. Bouverie, it has put forward in justification of its unwillingness to stir in the matter. London is a peculiar place, and arguments that apply to other parts of the country lose all their force when applied to such a vast assemblage of villages, towns, and cities as form its enormous bulk, and to such a multitude of human beings—all linked to each other in the capacities of employers and employed, buyers and sellers, masters and servants—as are comprised within its area. The inquiry could have done no harm, and might have done much good. It will remain with Mr. Ayrton and the other gentlemen who have taken charge of the question, and have pledged themselves to support it, to take care at the commencement of next Session that neither Mr. Bouverie, or whoever else may be President of the Poor-law Board at that time, nor any other official who may be charged to speak in the name of the Government, shall have the two first of the excuses put forward on this occasion. It will be time enough to consider the last two, and the principle involved, when the inquiry has come to an end, and the Committee has made its report on the whole subject, and submitted the evidence to the wisdom of Parliament.

ALTHOUGH a superabundance of sentimentality is circulated in favour of unmistakably criminal persons, there is, nevertheless, a sound discriminating spirit abroad, which, if duly encouraged, will tend more to solve the difficulty as to the treatment of criminals than all the congressional discussions that have yet taken place. We have no wish to diminish the credit due to those who endeavour to restore to honesty the unhappy persons who have fallen; or to make virtuous, respectable, and useful those who, to all appearance, were born and cradled and trained in crime. What we desire to further is the successful working of a practicable scheme. Some lengthened and learned discussions in favour of the plan suggested by Mr. Charles Pearson, the City Solicitor, have lately taken place at the Mansion House, under the presidency of the Lord Mayor; and other meetings, presided over by the veteran Lord Brougham, in which Mr. M. D. Hill, Colonel Jebb, and others took part, have tended still further to attract attention to the subject. But while these distinguished persons were meeting, discussing, and resolving that "something" ought to be done, it appears that one Andrew Walker, once a City missionary, and now a florist and gardener, has not been contented with talking, but has been doing "something," and proving, by the test of experience, that not only are the apparently incorrigible capable of improvement, but that they may, with kindly attention and healthy labour, be permanently reclaimed.

To the nursery of Andrew Walker we desire to draw the attention of our readers. It is situated in the Bedford-road, Clapham-rise, and the labourers are all persons who have been convicted of crime. His experience as a City missionary led him to the conclusion that labour was the best reformer. Trained as a gardener, he conceived the idea of opening a nursery-garden, and inviting youths and children who seemed predestined to be the outcasts of society to become his labourers. His plan, so far as his means permitted him, has proved eminently successful. Out of the small number on which he has experimented, if we may use the term, six have been restored to their parents, ten have obtained situations, three have entered the Army, two the Navy, one has emigrated, and only one has shown signs of relapsing into his former evil courses.

Of all labour there is none that appears more likely to touch the feelings of the criminal than that of attending plants and flowers. The budding, blooming, and ripening of the fruit are not unfrequently accompanied by the awakening of conscience; and honest Andrew has often had occasion to rejoice in observing the feeble virtue become strong, and the skulking outcast lift up his head and assume the attitude of sturdy manhood, after a course of gardening, and of the moral and religious training with which he allied it. From Andrew Walker's own story, and from other details with which we have been furnished, we find that the pecuniary responsibility under which he labours impedes to some extent the success and the usefulness of the project. It has, therefore, been suggested that philanthropists who have the heart and the means should subscribe a certain sum and raise the fund that may be deemed necessary to give the experiment a fairer trial than it has yet received. Those who take an interest in this subject can visit his modest institution and judge for themselves whether it is capable of expansion, and whether he has begun a good work which only needs proper management to grow into one still better. We shall be happy if this public notice of his efforts shall prove the means of extending the sphere of his benevolent operations, and of inducing others to imitate his example.

THE QUEEN'S BIRTHDAY HONOURED IN RUSSIA.—A dinner was given on the 23rd ultimo, at Riga, by Mr Richard Levinge Swift, her Britannic Majesty's Consul, to the Russian authorities and principal English residents, in honour of the Queen's birthday. Prince Sawsorsoi, Aide-de-Camp to the Emperor, and Governor-General of the provinces, accepted the Consul's invitation. The dinner passed off with great good feeling on all sides. The Prince, in most gracious terms, proposed the health of the Queen, which was responded to by Mr. Richard Levinge Swift, who, in return, proposed the Emperor of Russia—the respective national anthems following each toast. A most agreeable evening was spent, and the party did not separate until a late hour.—A memorial has been recently forwarded to the Earl of Clarendon from several influential British residents at Riga, gratefully acknowledging his Lordship's kindness in appointing Mr. Richard Levinge Swift as Consul at that place, and praying his Lordship to maintain an appointment which has "met with general approval," which will "greatly contribute to smooth down in these parts the hostile feelings against the English, engendered by the late war," and conduce most materially to the general "advancement of British interests" in that part of the world.

EDUCATIONAL CONFERENCE.—The arrangements for the educational conference, over which his Royal Highness Prince Albert is to preside, have been completed, and a large number of distinguished persons from all parts of the country have intimated their intention of being present. His Royal Highness will take the chair at the opening meeting, which is to be held on Monday next, at three o'clock, at Willis's Rooms, Earl Granville, President of the council, acting as vice-president. On the following day the various sections will meet at the Thatched House Tavern, when various papers in connection with education will be read, and other matters discussed. His Royal Highness will preside at a final meeting, which will be held on Wednesday, June 24, at Willis's Rooms, when the reports from the various sections will be made.

MR. KNOWLES, the eminent Queen's Counsel, is about to resign the office of Attorney-General to the county palatine of Lancaster, in consequence of his retiring from the Northern Circuit; it being his intention in future to confine his practice to the London Courts and the Committees of both Houses of Parliament.

THE COURT.

THE Court has had a busy week since its return from Windsor Castle, where the hospitalities of the Sovereign were dispensed to a brilliant circle of the aristocracy during the Ascot races. Arriving at Buckingham Palace on Saturday, her Majesty received on the following day the Archduke Maximilian, brother of the Emperor of Austria, who is on a marriage tour to meet his bride, the Princess Charlotte of Belgium, cousin of the Queen. The Archduke landed at Portsmouth on Sunday morning, and, coming to town by special train on the South-Western Railway, was met at Nine Elms by the Prince Consort.

On Monday the Queen gave a grand dinner at Buckingham Palace, the company at which included the Archduke Maximilian of Austria, the Princess Royal, Prince Frederick William of Prussia, the Duke of Cambridge, the Duchess of Sutherland, the Earl and Countess Granville, the Belgian Minister and Madame Van de Weyer, the Austrian Minister, the Marquis of Breadalbane, the Marquis of Abercorn, the Earl of Aberdeen, Viscountess Palmerston, Viscount Castlereagh, and Lady Hamilton Seymour.

On Tuesday the ceremony of the baptism of her Royal Highness the Infant Princess, fifth daughter of her Majesty the Queen and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, took place in the chapel within Buckingham Palace. In the evening the Queen and her illustrious visitors went to the Italian Opera in the Haymarket.

On Wednesday the Queen and Prince Albert honoured with their presence the performance of the oratorio of "Judas Maccabeus" at the Handel Festival in the Crystal Palace at Sydenham. Her Majesty and her illustrious visitors left Buckingham Palace at five minutes past twelve o'clock, escorted by a detachment of light dragoons. The Queen, the Princess Royal, the Archduke Maximilian of Austria, and Prince Frederick William of Prussia were in the first carriage. Prince Albert, the Prince of Wales, the Princess Alice, and Prince Alfred occupied the second carriage. The Court returned to Buckingham Palace at six o'clock.

On Thursday the Queen held a Levee at St. James's Palace, which was very numerously attended by officers of both services and by civilians

On Saturday (this day, the Queen will receive an address of congratulation on the birth of a Princess from the Corporation of the city of London.

THE ROYAL CHRISTENING.

The ceremony of christening the infant daughter of the Queen and the Prince Consort took place on Tuesday in the private chapel of Buckingham Palace.

The Archbishop of Canterbury, followed by the Bishop of London and the Bishops and clergymen assisting, entered the chapel at ten minutes before one o'clock. The Archbishop took his place on one side of the communion-table, and the Bishop on the other.

The communion-table was covered with crimson velvet, bordered with deep gold lace, and edged with bullion fringe. In front of the table, immediately below the steps by which it is approached, was placed the beautiful christening-font of silver gilt, elevated on a fluted circular pedestal of white and gold. The font contained water brought from the river Jordan, and prepared to her Majesty's specially for the occasion.

The foreign Ministers and Cabinet Ministers present at the solemnity were conducted by the heralds to seats in the chapel.

All the visitors appeared in full-dress uniform; the Ambassador of France and the foreign Ministers all wore the insignia of different orders of Knighthood. Lords Lansdowne, Clarendon, and Palmerston each wore the "Garter," together with the gold and enamelled collar of that order. The Duke of Argyll and Lord Panmure both wore the collar of the Thistle, and the noble Lord also wore the collar of the Order of the Bath. The Lord Chancellor appeared in his gold robe, and the Duke of Norfolk carried his gold Baton as Earl Marshal of England.

The procession of the sponsors entered the chapel at five minutes before one o'clock, and was immediately followed by that of the Sovereign.

The Queen wore a white and silver moiré antique dress, trimmed with a deep flounce of Honiton lace, white tulle, and bunches of silver flowers. The top of her corsage was fringed all round with diamonds. Her Majesty also wore a diamond circlet, diamond earrings, a diamond necklace, and the ribbon of the Order of the Garter, from which was suspended a very magnificent "George" composed of brilliants.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent wore a white brocade dress, trimmed with blonde, satin ribbon, and tulle. The stomacher was ornamented with diamonds. Her Royal Highness's head-dress was formed of ostrich feathers, blonde, and white flowers, with ornaments of amethysts and diamonds.

The Princess Alice wore a dress of rich Honiton lace, trimmed with white flowers, over a white glacé silk.

The Princess Helena and Louisa were dresses of Isle of Wight lace, trimmed with blossoms, over a white glacé silk.

The Duchess of Cambridge wore a white glacé silk, embroidered with bugles and rich fringe; the stomacher ornamented with pearls, a pearl necklace and earrings. Her Royal Highness's head-dress was formed of a small diamond tiara and white feathers.

The Princess Mary of Cambridge wore a dress of white tulle, over a rich white glacé petticoat, trimmed with bouillonnés, white ribbon, and bouquets of May. The body of the dress was ornamented to match; with a stomacher of large pearls and diamonds. Pearl necklace and earrings. Her Royal Highness also had a diamond tiara, with bunches of May at the sides of the head

The Archduke Maximilian appeared in the uniform of the navy of Austria—dark blue, with gold appointments. His Royal Highness wore the collar of the Golden Fleece, together with the insignia of a Belgian, a Portuguese, and two other orders of Knighthood.

Prince Albert was in the uniform of a Field-Marshal, and wore the collars of the Garter, the Golden Fleece, and of a Prussian Order of Knighthood.

The Prince of Wales, Prince Alfred, and Prince Arthur appeared in the Highland dress.

Prince Frederick William of Prussia wore the uniform of the Prussian Guards—dark blue, and silver. His Royal Highness wore the collar of the Black Eagle of Prussia and the ribbon of the Saxon Ernestine Order.

The Duke of Cambridge wore his military uniform, with the collars of the Orders of the Garter and the Bath.

The Royal Highness the Hereditary Prince of Saxe Meiningen was habited in a uniform of dark blue, with gold appointments, and wore the gold collar and star of an Order of Knighthood.

Her Majesty's private band with vocal and instrumental performers from the Royal theatres and Opera-House, together with the choir of the Chapel Royal, were in the music-gallery. Dr. Gauntlett presided at the organ.

The Lord Bishop of Montreal officiated as sponsor on the part of the Duchess of Kent, the Princess Royal, and Prince Frederick William of Prussia stood as proxies for the Princess Mary of Cambridge, the Duke of Cambridge, the Hereditary Prince of Saxe Meiningen, and Prince Edward of Saxe Weimar.

Opposite the sponsors were the Archduke Maximilian of Austria, her Majesty the Queen, Prince Arthur, Prince Albert, the Duchess of Cambridge, the Prince of Wales, the Princesses Alice, Helena, and Louisa, and Prince Alfred.

The service was opened by the performance of a chorale, "In life's gay morn," composed by Prince Albert.

The Marquis of Breadalbane, Lord Chamberlain, accompanied by the Marquis of Abercorn, Groom of the Stole to Prince Albert, conducted the infant Princess into the chapel, her Royal Highness being carried by the head nurse, and attended by Lady Caroline Barrington.

The infant Princess wore a robe of Honiton lace over white satin.

The Archbishop of Canterbury proceeded with the baptismal service; and, when His Grace came to name her Royal Highness, Lady Caroline Barrington presented the Princess at the font, and her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent held her. Her Princess Royal and Prince Frederick William of Prussia stood at the font, and when named by the Princess Mary of Cambridge, the Duke of Cambridge, the Hereditary Prince of Saxe Meiningen, and Prince Edward of Saxe Weimar.

The Princess Beatrice was conducted from the chapel, and a chorus, "Hallelujah," Beethoven ("Mount of Olives"), was performed; and at two o'clock her Majesty and the whole of the company entered the ball and concert room, where luncheon was served.

During the collation, Earl Spencer, Lord Steward of the Queen's Household, gave the following toasts, viz., "Her Royal Highness the Princess Royal." "His Royal Highness the Archduke Maximilian of Austria." "His Royal Highness Prince Frederick William of Prussia," and "The Queen and the Prince."

The christening cake was placed in the middle of the table opposite her Majesty.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, attended by Lady Augusta Bruce and Sir George Couper, arrived at her residence, Clarence House, St. James's, on Monday, from Frogmore.

Their Royal Highnesses the Duchess of Cambridge and the Princess Mary arrived at their residence at St. James's Palace, on Monday evening, from Cambridge Cottage, Kew.

The Archduke Maximilian of Austria, attended by Count Charles Fitzroy, went on Monday morning to St. Paul's Cathedral, and afterwards inspected Westminster Abbey and the New Palace of Westminster. His Imperial Highness paid visits in the afternoon to their Royal Highnesses the Duchess of Kent, the Duchess of Cambridge, and the Duke of Cambridge, at their respective residences.

His Excellency the Earl Cowley has arrived in Cleveland-square, from visiting her Majesty at Windsor Castle. The noble Earl returns to Paris next week.

MISS ANNA GURNEY, a member of the well-known Gurney family, died a few days since at the residence of her brother, Mr. Hudson Gurney, at Keswick, near Norwich. Miss Gurney published an excellent translation of the Saxon Chronicle; and, living at Northrupps, near the coast, she took a lively interest in inventions for saving the lives of shipwrecked mariners. To promote the latter object she had a gun manufactured, at her own expense, to fire off a line to a storm-tossed wreck.

SKETCHES IN PARLIAMENT.

THE English Legislature is composed of most honourable men, but our House of Commons, with its practical aspect, is a standing proof that the age of chivalry has passed; else why did members only laugh and grow comical when the woes of the ladies at her Majesty's Drawingroom were brought before them in a speech which might have been culled from the pages of "Amadis de Gaul," and with an earnest sense of injury, on the part of Mr. George Dundas, that ought to have been pathetic, but was not? Nevertheless there were excuses for the House, which remained in a state of creditable gravity through a great part of an address which was provocative enough of laughter, owing to the lugubrious solemnity of the speaker; but, when the hon. member wound up to a climax with a ringing intonation of the word "beauty," human patience could resist no longer, and peals on peals of laughter broke out, and the whole thing continued to be treated from a frolicsome point of view, until a communication from the Commissioner of Works that alterations were to be made in St. James's Palace to fit it for the reception of a thousand or fifteen hundred loyal visitors to her Majesty produced the pertinent inquiry as to who was to pay? The result was a return to gravity, and the consciousness that the business of the evening was a very serious one indeed—namely, the Civil Service Estimates.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury is undoubtedly a master of fence, both in and out of Parliament. To him they say we owe the small but ingenious device of slipping into a bill, at an unexpected stage, two or three words which as nearly as possible saddled the country with the war Income-tax for two years after the conclusion of the war. To him, therefore, no doubt, belongs the notable scheme of mystification with which a subject of some dread to the Government was met. It was well understood that the increase of the Civil Service Estimates would generate heavy, and perhaps damaging, debate; and the idea of going into a preliminary statement, crammed with figures and comparisons of years, carefully remote—in fact, a quasi Budget—was justified by its perfect success. Such a mess such an intricate confusion—has seldom been witnessed in a sober-going Committee of Supply; and when, at length, after five hours' debate, in which every man fought, like Harry Smith, for his own hand, the evening concluded without a single vote having been passed; the complacency with which Mr. Wilson contemplated the result of his handiwork must have been to him a grateful and exceeding reward. The "dodge," not to speak it profanely, was worthy of Lord Palmerston's management of the House; no words can better express Mr. Wilson's success.

The debate on the Oaths Bill, though dull, was in some respects remarkable. There were two striking instances of self-denial which are rare enough in Parliamentary annals. There was Mr. Deasy, who has the reversion of the Solicitor-Generalship for Ireland in his pocket, rising with an intensity of purpose, which caused him to seem as if he was speaking with his teeth clenched and his fingers clutching together, to oppose the great popularity scheme of the Premier, who is to make him a law officer of the Crown at the very first opportunity. Well, he did it bravely. As an old huntsman once instructed a timid gentleman on his nearing what appeared to be an impracticable leap, he had only to shut his eyes, harden his heart, and go at it like lightning. He spoke, he divided, he was beaten; and he received as good an assurance from the first Minister as he could give publicly in Parliament that he had not sinned past forgiveness, or postponed his hopes of the Bench for another lustrum.

It is not easy to sketch a portrait of a member of Parliament making a recantation of opinion at the table of the House of Commons, and therefore one is not inclined to attempt to describe the appearance of Sir John Pakington when he declared that, owing to circumstances into which he did not think it necessary to enter, he had been led to consider the claims of the Jews—("claims" would have been an unwise assumption with "Jews" but for the context,—to have seats in Parliament. Be it understood, however, that Sir John, albeit a little prosy, and from a long chairman-of-quarter-sessions' experience rather apt to be always "summing up at great length," is a manly though diminutive person; and, moreover, notwithstanding the attending forty dinners at the Carlton Club, he is on the whole a very advanced Liberal. He therefore did his duty on the occasion well and courageously—undaunted by the psychical sneer of Mr Whiteside, who rose at the moment of Sir John's recantation and walked bouncingly out of the House, and undeterred by the presence of Mr. Disraeli, who did not think proper to give his personal countenance and support to the utterance of opinions which he himself professes in opposition to those of his party by the newfound convert

In that same discussion, when the author of "Eothen" rose to make his maiden speech, the House paid him that tribute which is generally the utmost they afford to the greatest of out-door celebrities they prepared to listen to him. They certainly did not expect that so world-famous a person could deliver himself of some evidently preconceived and arranged sentences for about seven or eight minutes, and, having reached an oratorical climax, pause, falter, and finally sit down—a failure. With all his admitted talents, better men than Mr. Kinglake have found the difficulty of first facing the House of Commons too much for their nerves; and he may be sure that faith in his capability of yet doing himself justice in Parliament is by no means extinct. There were few who witnessed what is technically called his "breakdown" who did not murmur "He will do yet!"

It must be a little scandalous in the eyes of many persons to see in a newspaper report of a speech in Parliament the quotation of a solemn text of Scripture followed by the words "roars of laughter." Now, it was Mr. Warren, and not the House, who was answerable for that unseemliness. If that gentleman could deliver what sounded like a wild chapter from the "Lily and the Bee" (can the force of language further go?) in a tone which can only be described by a seeming contradiction in terms namely, as that of a High Church conventicle (there are such things as High Church Radicals, be it observed)—members could hardly be blamed for yielding to their risible nerves before they had time to consider the serious nature they were laughing at. The honourable member for Midhurst is, unless he is much belied, capable of better things than the speech he was unwise enough to deliver on the Oaths Bill.

There was a Parliamentary phenomenon last Tuesday—namely, a quiet, sober, pleasant debate on an Irish bill. Very striking and very strange it was to see Mr. Whiteside and the Attorney-General for Ireland handying amenities, and agreeing to each other's amendments; while Mr. Henry Herbert, the new Chief Secretary for Ireland, who appeared as an official for the first time, went about radiant with smiles, interchanging courtesies with Irish members of all parties, and doing his best to cancel and obliterate a notion which has become very prevalent during the last two years, that a Secretary for Ireland is sure to be a repulsive and unpleasant man. This was in the morning, from twelve to four. About half-past eleven on the same night the old Irish element reasserted itself. In Committee on an Irish bill, the same old, wearisome, bull-headed tactics were displayed, until, at two o'clock, a significant hint was given that it was time to release the officials, who had been in the House since twelve o'clock on the day before, by the simultaneous retirement of the reporters from their gallery. Still the persistent patriots from the sister island went on; and at length some English member, it is to be supposed, who, for an unexplained and unexplainable reason, had remained in the House until then, cut the matter short by moving that the members present be counted—a very unusual proceeding in Committee, and which involves the necessity of sending for the Speaker before the adjournment necessarily attendant on there not being forty members present can be carried. This assertion of the privilege of counting out was never more worthily exercised, even if it were only out of pity to Lord Palmerston, who, true to the rule which he seems to have laid down for himself since he has been Premier, remained in his seat, motionless and with his arms folded, until the last. At that moment we could not help thinking that, considering what he must have gone through that night, we would rather be a galley-slave, pro hac vi, than a Prime Minister.

DOUGLAS JERROLD.

THE original edition of "Cakes and Ale," a series of stories and essays, was dedicated by Douglas Jerrold to Thomas Hood. In Jerrold's collected works the dedication is repeated, with this addition:—

This humble offering is herewith renewed, with the expression of a regret that it was necessary for Thomas Hood still to do one thing ere the wide circle and the profound depth of his genius were to the full acknowledged: that one thing was—to die.

The universal sentiment that has burst forth upon the death of Douglas Jerrold himself is something like an approach to the full acknowledgment of his genius. That sentiment is the first expression of the recognition of the value of what is "lack'd and lost." But, when some years have passed away, as had passed when this tribute to Thomas Hood was renewed, then will the genius of Douglas Jerrold be acknowledged in its "profound depth" as in its manifest brilliancy, and the "wide circle" of his wisdom and his knowledge be as well perceived as the exuberance of his fancy and the smartness of his satire.

In the writings of Jerrold, of which the more important of a continuous character have been republished uniformly, as revised by himself,* the world will find few traces of an autobiographical nature. As in most writers of original genius, the universal largely predominated over the personal. Those who were in habits of confidence and intimacy with him may probably trace some scenes and characters suggested by his own experience; but in his writings we scarcely ever see his individuality. In the republication of his works the prefatory notices are extremely slight. One single paragraph of introduction to the present volume points to their author's early career:—

The completion of the first volume of a collected edition of his writings—scattered over the space of years—is an opportunity tempting to the vanity of a writer to indulge in a retrospect of the circumstances that first made authorship his hope, as well as of the general tenour of his after vocation. I will not, at least, in these pages, yield to the inducement, farther than to say that, self-helped and self-guided, I began the world at an age when, as a general rule, boys have not laid down their primers; that the cockpit of a man-of-war was at thirteen exchanged for the struggle of London; that appearing in print ere, perhaps, the meaning of words was duly mastered, no one can be more alive than myself to the worthlessness of such early mutterings.

This interesting passage will be elaborated by future biographers into ample details of "the struggle of London;" and the more anecdotes we have that will clearly show the zeal and perseverance of the "self-helped and self-guided" young man, the better will it be for all other young men who may imitate his earnest diligence, however inferior may be their natural endowments. Nor is this passage without less obvious lessons. "No one can be more alive than myself to the worthlessness of such early mutterings," is not the mere expression of an amiable modesty. Jerrold knew perfectly well what many who rush prematurely into print do not know—that success, large and enduring in literature, can only be raised upon the foundations of patient thought, unrelaxing observation, wide acquaintance with the great masters of their art, education always progressing and never finished. Up to the very last days of his life Jerrold was a diligent reader. His great refreshment was to turn from the matters of passing interest with which it was his vocation to deal, to seek the companionship of some old wise teacher, under whose quaint style were to be found high thoughts and sound information. His mind was a great storehouse of very various knowledge, not indeed of the abstract sciences or critical philology, but a knowledge derived from a large acquaintance with the productions of the highest minds of all ages, to whom science and language have been as materials to be welded into poetry and philosophy. To his perfect familiarity with the best old English writers may be ascribed much of the terseness and condensation of Jerrold's own style—its thoroughly suggestive character. His written sentences, like his conversational sallies, had more in them than was at first perceived. They first amused, and then made us think.

There is one passage in the preface to Douglas Jerrold's collected works which has a bearing upon his personal character. He had an unaffected dislike of being considered and spoken of as a wit. His wit was the spontaneous result of his temperament, and of his marvellously quick perception of the relations between seemingly incongruous objects out of which wit is engendered. But he had a greater dislike of being reputed an ill-natured satirist. He knew that the world had given him this reputation, but he also knew how little the world understood his real relations of love and kindness to all humanity. The passage to which we refer is this:—

In conclusion I submit this volume to the generous interpretation of the reader. Some of it has been called "bitter;" "indeed "bitter" has, I think, a little too often been the ready word when certain critics have condescended to bend their eyes upon my page;—so ready that, were my ink redolent of myrrh and frankincense, I well know the sort of ready-made criticism that would cry, with a denouncing shiver, "Aloes! aloes!"

We have no intention of offering any connected notice of Jerrold's works, or even here indicating their chronological arrangement. Those who now for the first time read them with attention may not be carried rapidly forward by his power of telling a story; for to produce a sustained narrative, with an interest continually deepening, was not wholly within his mastery. His exuberant fancy constantly led him out of the direct paths in which less-gifted writers may safely walk. But readers familiar or unfamiliar with Jerrold's larger productions will pause at every page upon the force of thought and the felicities of style. Neither is his power of describing natural scenery or of exhibiting graphic pictures of general society very remarkable. His tendency to reflection, coloured by the bright or sombre hues of that fancy of which we speak, led him always from this distinct word-painting. Take as an example, his description of Receivers, in Kent. We have no definite view of the old Roman station, the ruined church, or the mouldering cliff; but how like is this brief sketch to the tone of Sir Thomas Brown's "Urn Burial":—

And there, where the ocean tumbles, was in the olden day a goodly town sapped, swallowed, by the weaving, the voracious sea. At lowest tides the people still discover odd, quaint, household relics which, despite the homely breeding of the finders, must carry away their thoughts into the mist of time, and make them feel antiquity. The very children of the village are hucksters of the spoils of dead centuries. They grow up with some small trading knowledge of fossils; and are deep, very deep, in all sorts of petrifactions. They must have strange early sympathies towards that mysterious town, with all its tradesfolk and marketfolk sunk below the sea; a place of which they have a constant inkling in the petty spoils lashed upward by the tempest. Indeed, it is difficult for the mind to conceive the annihilation of a whole town—engulphed in the ocean. The trickay fancy will assert itself; and, looking over the shining water, with summer basking on it, we are apt to dream that the said market-town has only suffered a "sea change;" and that, fathoms deep, the town still stands—that busy life goes on—that people of an odd, sea-green aspect, it may be, still carry on the work of mortal breathing, make love, beget little ones, and die. But this, indeed, is the dream of idleness. Yet who, if he could change his mind at will, would make his mind incapable of such poor fantasies? How much of the coarse web of existence owes its beauty to the idlest dreams with which we colour it!

But, if there be one charm more than another in all the writings of Douglas Jerrold, it is the voice that is constantly urging on the great duty of human brotherhood. He has had noble fellow-labourers in the great attempt—which is now beginning to look less like a dream—of bringing classes that have been too long separated into a more just knowledge of each other, and, therefore, into more active sympathy. But no one has laboured longer in this work, or has laboured more consistently, than Jerrold. He has not sought to set classes at enmity. He has been indignant at the callousness of the sordid rich; but he has not taught the poor that the rich and the high-born were their social enemies. As a public journalist he had large opportunities of sowing discontent with the great principles of society and government; but he had more practical views, and, therefore, more benevolent views. No one ever more beautifully expressed a deep sense of the nobility of the poor than he has done in a passage of his "Clovernook":—

"It is a fine show, a golden sight, to see the crowning of a King. I have beheld the ceremony; with undazzled eyes have well-considered all its blaze of splendour. A tender thing to think of is the kiss of peace; beautiful the homage; heart-stirring the voice of the champion, when the brave knight dashes his defying gauntlet on the marble stone; very solemn the anointing, and most uplifting the song of jubilate when all is done. But, Sir, to my coarse apprehension, I have seen a nobler sight than this, a grander ceremony, even at the hearthstone of the poor. I will show you a man, worn, spent—the bony outline of a human thing, with toil and want out, as with an iron tool, upon him; a man to whom the common pleasures of this our mortal heritage are unknown as the joys of Paradise. This man toils and starves, and starves and toils, even as the markets vary. Well, he keeps a heart, sound as oak, in his bosom. As the sanctity of his soul, bestows the kiss of peace upon a grudging world; he compels the homage of respect, and champions himself against the harduess of fortune. In his wretched homestead he is throned in the majesty of the affections. His suffering, patient, loving wife—his pale-faced, ill-clad children—are his queen and subjects. He is a king in heart, subduing and ruling the iron host. Unseen spirits of love and goodness anoint him; and, Sir,"—said the Hermit in solemn voice—"as surely as the kingdom of God is more than a fairy tale, so surely do God's angels sing that poor man's jubilate."

We might readily prolong this very imperfect notice of Douglas Jerrold's writings and character. To those who know him well it is quite unnecessary to expatiate upon the genuineness of that character. Those who knew him only by common report may have believed that a satirist could not be generous and benevolent, and a strong political writer tolerant and just. He did his work in the world like a brave and honest man; and, as many other brave and honest men, was sometimes misinterpreted. But, as "Time works wonders," one of the wonders which it will assuredly work will be to make all know that Douglas Jerrold was one of the largest charity, as well as of the brightest genius.

Douglas Jerrold was born in Greek-street, Soho, on the 3rd of January, 1803, and died at Greville-place, Kilburn Priory, on the 8th of June, after a short illness. His funeral took place on Monday last, at the Norwood Cemetery, and was attended by about two thousand persons, amongst whom were—Sir Joseph Paxton, M.P., Mr. Monckton Milnes, M.P., Mr. Charles Knight, Mr. Charles Dickens, Mr. Thackeray, Messrs. Horace, Henry, and Augustus Mayhew, Mr. Albert Smith, Mr. Peter Cunningham, Mr. Mark Lemon, Mr. J. Leech, Professor Tom Taylor, Mr. Shirley Brooks, Mr. A. Egg, Mr. E. M. Ward, Messrs. Thomas and George Lansear, Mr. Benjamin Webster, Mr. Buckstone, Mr. Creswick, Mr. Robert Ball, Mr. Hepworth Dixon, Mr. Hernaid, Mr. S. Lucas, Mr. John Forster, Mr. Bradbury, Mr. Evans, Mr. Hamsteed, Mr. Mitchell, R.I.S.; Mr. Frank Stone, Mr. E. S. Pigott, Mr. J. Hanney, Mr. Frith, Mr. Maclise, Mr. Tennicl, Dr. Diamond, Dr. Percy, Mr. Bailey, Dr. Erasmus Wilson, Dr. Quain, and almost every other literary and artistic celebrity at present in London.

The funeral service was read in an impressive manner by the Rev. Mr. Hugo, an old friend of Douglas Jerrold; and a large concourse of people assembled to witness this ceremony and pay a tribute to the memory of the deceased. The plate on the coffin bore the inscription "Douglas William Jerrold, Esq., died the 8th of June, 1857 aged 54 years."

The Athenæum (in an excellent article on Douglas Jerrold) says:

His fault as a man if it be a fault—was a too great tenderness of heart. He never could say "No." His purse—when he had a purse—was at every man's service, as were also his time, his pen, and his influence in the world. If he possessed a shilling somebody would get sixpence of it from him. He had a lending look, of which many took advantage. The first time he ever saw Tom Dibdin, that worthy gentleman and song-writer said to him, "Youngster, have you sufficient confidence in me to lend me a guinea?" "Oh, yes," said the author of "Black-eyed Susan," "I have all the confidence, but I haven't the guinea." A generosity which knew no limit—not even the limit at his banker's—led him into trials from which a colder man would have easily escaped. To give all that he possessed to relieve a brother from immediate trouble was nothing; he as willingly mortgaged his future for a friend as another man would bestow his advice or his blessing. And yet this man was accused of ill-nature! If every one who received a kindness at his hands should lay a flower on his tomb, a mountain of roses would rise on the last restingplace of Douglas Jerrold.

It is consequent upon this generosity—this reliance upon the truth of others—that various performances are announced to take place in remembrance of this distinguished writer, and for the benefit of his family; for which the following arrangements have been made:—

Committee—Mr John Blackwood, Mr. Shirley Brooks, Mr. John H. Buckstone, Mr. Peter Cunningham, Mr. Charles Dickens, Mr John Forster, Mr. Charles Knight, Mr. Mark Lemon, Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton, Bart., M.P., Mr. William C. Macready, Sir Joseph Paxton, M.P., Mr William H. Russell, Mr. Albert Smith, Mr. Clarkson Stanfield, R.A., Mr William M Thackeray, and Mr. Benjamin Webster

Honorary Secretary—Mr. Arthur Smith

The Committee, in remembrance of their deceased friend, beg to announce the following occasions

On Saturday, June 27, a musical festival will take place, at which Madame Novello, Mr. and Mrs. T. German Reed, Miss Dolby, Mr. Albert Smith Miss Mary Keeley, Mr. Sims Reeves and many other distinguished artists will assist. To commence at seven o'clock precisely

On Tuesday, June 30, Mr. Charles Dickens will read his "Christmas Carol," in St. Martin's Hall. The reading will commence at eight precisely, and will last two hours. Prices of admission: Stalls, 5s., body of the hall and centre gallery, each 3s.; back seats and side galleries, each 1s

On Tuesday, July 7, Mr. W. H. Russell will deliver his "Personal Narrative of the late Crimean War," in St Martin's Hall. To commence at eight precisely, and last two hours. Prices of admission: Stalls, 5s., body of the hall and centre gallery, each 3s.; back seats and side galleries, each 1s

On Saturday, July 11, will be represented at the Gallery of Illustration, Regent-street, Mr Wilkie Collins's new romantic drama in three acts, "The Lighthouse," performed by the author and a company of ladies and gentlemen who originally represented it in private. With the original scenery, by Mr. Stanfield, R.A., and Mr. Telbin, and the original music under the direction of Mr. Francesco Berger. The whole under the direction of Mr. Charles Dickens. To conclude with a farce. Prices of admission—Stalls, one guinea; area, 10s.; amphitheatre, 5s

On Wednesday, July 15, will be represented at the Theatre Royal, Haymarket, the late Mr. Douglas Jerrold's comedy, in three acts, "The Housekeeper." To conclude with the late Mr. Douglas Jerrold's drama, "The Prisoner of War." Represented by the company of the theatre, in conjunction with Mr and Mrs. Keeley, Mr. Benjamin Webster, and Mr. Phelps. Prices of admission—Stalls, 10s. 6d. The rest of the house as usual, except the private boxes, which may be had at the committee's office.

On Wednesday, July 22nd, Mr. W. M. Thackeray will deliver a lecture on "Week-day Preachers," in St Martin's Hall. To commence at eight precisely, and last one hour and a half. Prices of admission:—Stalls, 5s.; body of the hall and centre gallery, each 3s.; back seats and side galleries, each 1s.

On Wednesday, July 29th, will be presented at the Theatre Royal Adelphi, the late Mr Douglas Jerrold's comedy, in three acts, "The Rent Day." To conclude with the late Mr. Douglas Jerrold's drama, "Black-eyed Susan." Represented by the company of the theatre, in conjunction with Mr. T. P. Cooke and Mr. Rouse. Prices of admission Stalls, 10s. 6d. The rest of the house as usual, except the private boxes, which may be had at the committee's office

On and after Wednesday, June 24th, tickets for any or all of these occasions will be on sale at the committee's office, at the Gallery of Illustration, every day between the hours of ten and four.

The portrait we engrave is from a photograph taken a few weeks ago by his friend Dr. Diamond, and has been selected as being the best resemblance (next to Bailey's bust) of the deceased.

THE LATE MR. DOUGLAS JERROLD.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY DR. DIAMOND.

MEMORIAL TABLET AT STOCKPORT.—A tablet is about to be erected in the Stockport Sunday-schools to the memory of Mr Joseph Mayer and Mr. John Turner, for the benefit of which establishment they laboured many years. Messrs. Patteson, of Manchester, have constructed the tablet, which is of Carrara marble, and of a neat Grecian design. The inscription records that Mr. Mayer for sixty-five years devoted himself to the work of Sunday-school education, and that the tablet has been erected from subscriptions by all classes. Mr. Turner is recorded to have laboured for fifty years in the Stockport school, in various capacities, during forty of which he held the office of general inspector. The inscription states the memorial to have been designed "to perpetuate the memory of these good men, that others may be induced to imitate their example.

MEMORIAL TO THE LATE MR. BROTHERTON.—A fine memorial tablet has just been erected in the Bible Christians' Chapel, King-street, Salford, to commemorate the services of the late Mr. Brotherton, M.P. for Salford, and a pastor of that place of worship. The tablet, by Messrs. Patteson, of Manchester, is of white Carrara marble, with a border of black Irish marble.

* These works are comprised in eight vols. 1. "St. Giles and St. James." 2. "Men of Character." 3. "Caudle Lectures," &c. 4. "Cakes and Ale." 5. "Punch's Letters," &c. 6. "Man Made of Money," "Chronicles of Clovernook." 7, 8. "Comedies and Dramas."

SCENE AT THE LATE FIRE AT THE CAMDEN-TOWN GOODS STATION OF THE LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY.—(SEE NEXT PAGE)

THE LATE FIRE AT THE CAMDEN-TOWN STATION.

A LETTER has been sent to the newspapers from the General Manager's office, Euston station, stating that the loss by the late fire had been greatly exaggerated: that the entire weight of goods destroyed was about sixty tons: the insurances effected upon which will cover the loss, that instead of possessing quarters of corn having been destroyed, the entire quantity in the building was 400 quarters, with 100 quarters of beans; and that instead of the damage done amounting as it was assumed to 40,000*l.*, in all probability this sum is about four times the real amount, including the building.

We have received one of the most striking incidents of the conflagration. The fire broke out about twenty minutes past ten o'clock, at which time the whole of the collection of goods from the metropolis were in the building, either on the vans in which they had arrived, or in course of removal in the railway trucks for transmission to their various destinations viâ the London and North-Western line. The gas was burning brilliantly in every part of the immense area. On a sudden a more than ordinary blaze of light was discovered in the northern portion of the building—the hay-loft and corn-stores where the fodder for the horses was kept. A dense and suffocating smoke immediately succeeded. In a few minutes the flames shot up through the roof, and the whole neighbourhood became enveloped in a dense cloud of smoke. It appears that Mr. C. Weightman, upholsterer, of High-street, Camden-town, who was on the premises at the moment of the outbreak, not only suggested the removal of the horses, but with Mr. Brown, the keeper of an adjacent coffee-house and Mr. Alfred Timpson, butcher, of Park-street, at the risk of their lives, with several of the carmen, rushed into the stables beneath, let loose the horses, and turned them out. By this time the flames had spread with extraordinary rapidity through the hay into the other stores in an enormous height. Thousands of persons were assembled from all quarters. The terrified horses rushing out in droves in every direction at their utmost speed, to the imminent peril of those who were not fortunate enough to get out of their way, the shouts of the people, the now furious raging of the fire, the crackling of the ignited timber, and the continuous explosion of combustibles within the building, all contributed to produce an effect which may better be imagined or depicted than described.

COUNTRY NEWS.

SURREY ARCHÆOLOGICAL SOCIETY.—The fourth annual general meeting of this society will be held at Dorking, on Monday, the 29th inst., when the members and their friends will assemble at half-past twelve precisely at the Deepdene, the classic seat of Henry Thomas Hope, Esq., a V.P. of the society, and who will take the chair on the occasion. Papers on topics of local and general archæological interest will be read, and the members will afterwards have the opportunity afforded them of inspecting the matchless collection of Etruscan antiquities at the mansion, together with the numerous other choice and well-known works of art which it contains. An excursion to Wootton House, distant about three miles from Dorking, and long celebrated as the rural retreat of John Evelyn, the author of "Sylva" and the famous "Diary," will then be made, and W. J. Evelyn, Esq., M.P., of the society, will, on the express invitation of the council, offer some remarks on the house, its contents, and rural traditions, as illustrative of Evelyn and his family. Wootton and Abinger churches will also be visited by the society, who will afterwards dine together, at Dorking, at half-past six.

AT THE ART-TREASURES Exhibition this week there has been a fair attendance of fashionable visitors with season tickets and half-crowns; and excursion trains from Birmingham, Derby, Preston, Leeds, Wakefield, and Huddersfield brought an aggregate of nearly a thousand visitors. On Thursday, being the anniversary of the Battle of Waterloo, there was a strong muster of pensioners who had taken part in that memorable fight from Rochdale, Manchester, and other places, and their presence at the Exhibition attracted considerable attention.

THE GROTTO AT OATLANDS.—This interesting relic of the regal estate of Oatlands will be opened to the public for inspection from this day, the 20th, to the 30th inst., upon the payment of a small fee; the proceeds to be added to the fund which is being raised for the erection of a chapel in Oatlands Park.

PRESENTATION OF THE DUNMOW FLITCH OF BACON.—The celebration of this quaint and picturesque medieval custom, which was revived in July, 1855, mainly through the instrumentality of Mr. Harrison Ainsworth, is fixed to take place, with great eclat, at Great Dunmow, on Thursday next, the 25th instant.

A TERRIFIC EXPLOSION took place on Monday last at the powder-works, Hirod's Foot, about six miles and a half from Liskeard. Six or seven tons of powder exploded, destroying considerable property and killing two men.

BALLOON ASCENT.—Mr. Coxwell, accompanied by Mr. Youenns and Mr. Allan, took a night ascent in a balloon from North Woolwich on Monday last. They left the gardens at half-past seven o'clock, traversed a distance of 230 miles, and descended near Tavistock at half-past four on Tuesday morning. The balloon did not ascend to any great height, and was distinctly seen between Exeter and Newton.

CONVICTION OF BAKERS FOR ADULTERATING BREAD WITH ALUM.—On Tuesday several bakers were charged before the Uxbridge magistrates with using alum in the manufacture of their bread. The loaves when analysed were found to contain 25 to 30 grains of alum each. They were fined £6 each, with a further fine of 40*s.* for having alum in their possession, and £4 1*s.* costs—making altogether £11 1*s.* for each offender.

ATROCIOUS CRUELTY ON BOARD AN ENGLISH VESSEL.—A case of great atrocity was partly investigated on Friday, the 12th inst., at the Police Court, Liverpool. Henry Rogers, the captain of the ship Martha Jane, of Sunderland, Charles D. Seymour, his chief mate, and William Mills, his second mate, were charged with having taken the life of a sailor, named Andrew Rose, on the voyage between Demerara and Liverpool. The following facts, with others still more revolting, were adduced in evidence: The Martha Jane sailed from Demerara on the 11th of May. Andrew Rose, the deceased, was rather of weak intellect. For some slight offence the captain beat him most severely with a whip, and the mates also beat him with ropes' ends until his body became black and blue, and lacerated in several parts. The prisoners continued to beat him every day from the day the vessel sailed until he died. During that period his arms, legs, feet, and other portions of his body broke out into boles and running ulcers. His body was swollen, and bruised from head to foot by the terrible beatings inflicted on him by the three prisoners. The captain frequently set a ferocious dog kept on board at the deceased, both when in and out of irons, and the animal used to tear mouthfuls of flesh from the man, and inflict desperate wounds on him, which bled profusely. At one time, by direction of the captain, the other prisoners unloaded a water-cask, into which the poor wretch was put by the three prisoners. The cask was then headed in the usual way, and lashed down in its place. This was at twelve o'clock in the day, and he was left in that way until twelve at night, with the bunghole upwards. About two days before the vessel arrived off Cape Clear the man was taken by one of his comrades to the forecastle, when he partook of some tea; and next day he was called upon by the captain, who gave him what appeared to be some castor oil and brandy. On the next day a similar dose was administered to him. The man died, and was thrown overboard. The prisoners were remanded—bail being refused.

AN EXPLOSION took place on Tuesday morning at the gunpowder mills of Messrs. Curtis and Harvey, on Hounslow-heath, near the village of Bedfont, whereby the life of one man (Greaves) was sacrificed, and two others (Walker and Enst) are in imminent jeopardy.

TWENTY-FOUR FISHERMEN DROWNED.—Accounts have been received from Lerwick of the following calamitous event:—Early on the morning of Wednesday week, while the boats were prosecuting the fishing, they were overtaken by a sudden and severe gale of wind, by which three belonging to the Island of Uist, and one to North Mavine, were lost, with all on board. No fewer than twenty-four have perished, the greater part of whom have left helpless and destitute families.

ON Tuesday evening a terrific thunderstorm swept over Shrewsbury. The electric fluid struck the spire of the cemetery chapel, bending the vane and taking the gilding off; then, passing the solid stonework, shivered down the first turret-window, where it entered the stonework, splitting it down to the tower, a distance of about seventy feet.

REFORMATORY SCHOOLS.—The Secretary of State has certified that the Liverpool Reformatory School for Girls, at Mount Vernon Green, Liverpool; the Reformatory School at Kingswood, county of Somerset; and the North-Eastern Reformatory at Netherton, in the county of Northumberland, are fit to be reformatory schools under the statute 17th and 18th Vict., cap. 86.

THE GLASGOW POISONING CASE.—On Saturday night last Miss Madeleine Smith was served in Glasgow Prison with an indictment to stand her trial before the High Court of Justiciary in Edinburgh, on Tuesday, the 30th inst., on a charge of murdering, or of attempting to murder, Pierre Emile L'Angelier, by administering to him arsenic at different times, but particularly on the night between Sunday, the 22nd, and Monday, the 23rd of March last. The list of witnesses enumerated in the indictment extends to eighty-nine, including the father, mother, brothers, and sisters of the prisoner, and the domestics of the family, both in the townhouse and country residence.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

HER MAJESTY has a new visitor, in the person of the Archduke Maximilian of Austria. The fiancé of the Princess Royal is also here, and may be congratulated not only upon that fact, which, doubtless, is all that is delightful in his estimate, but upon the formal completion by the Legislature of the provision for himself and his amiable bride. The Queen, with her guests and a distinguished suite, was present at the second oratorio of the series given at the Crystal Palace in commemoration of Handel, and it is needless to say received the most cordial welcome from the thousands of her subjects who had assembled, > content to hear

> "Judas's "eulogy for Handel's sake.

The rush at the close of the performance to see the Royal party pass along the gallery on their way to the carriages was a severe one; and the interest of the public, excited by the pleasure of beholding their Sovereign smilingly thanking Sir Joseph Paxton for his attentions, was increased to an affectionate sympathy as the "engaged couple" advanced together; and the Archduke Maximilian heard a hurricane of such plaudits as can be obtained, in this country, only by those whom popular sentiment takes into especial favour.

If the Jews are not proud this week, they have managed to conquer that one sin of the elves. The whole élite of this Christian nation, headed by its Sovereign, has gathered in thousands to listen to the recitals of Hebrew story, in two instances the history being blended with our own creed; but in the third (the Queen's day) being a mere secular tale of the exploits of a brave Jew, who beat off his people's enemies. And not only were pleasure-seekers occupied by Jewish subjects—the House of Commons has held full sitting to discuss once more whether an English Jew shall be admitted to the same privileges as another Englisman, the discussion being marked by the recantation of a distinguished Conservative, Sir John Pakington, who announced his abnegation of his exclusive faith, and his having yielded to the "Jewish persuasion" upon the subject in hand. Assuredly the Hebrew element has been prominently presented to the Christian mind in England during the past week; but whether the results will be evidenced in any more tolerant feeling in the many, or any better logic in the few, has to be her eafter noted. The Roman Catholic party made a most unfortunate attack upon the Oaths Bill, and the selfish demonstration was repulsed in a way that effectually exposed "the nakedness of the land." All that the whipping of the whole party could do was to place it in a miserable minority of 83 on Mr. Deasy's motion. The recitative in "Macabeus" was curiously inapplicable to the events of the hour. The Jews could not be apprised that

> Rome, whate'er nation dare insult them more,
> Would rouse in their defence her veteran power;
> And stretch her vengeful arm o'er land and sea,
> To curb the proud, and set the injured free.

The Ultramontanists in Belgium, also, have sustained a severe humiliation by the wise conduct of King Leopold. He has intimated publicly that there are certain states of popular feeling with which it is best to make terms; and in closing the sitting of his Chambers he has signified that he will not prostrate the liberties of his subjects to the numerical superiority of the agents of Rome. The latter are furious, and have plausible excuse for being so, for, constitutionally speaking, they are in the right, a Ministry representing the majority having proposed the bill which has caused the inflammation. They do not hesitate to declare that the Constitution is subverted; but when one makes a "parallel passage" of their accompanying declaration that "the State should be a servant of the Church, as the Church is of God," their constitutional zeal acquires a new, if not a respectable, character. The King has acted most judiciously, and all who take friendly interest in the kingdom thus unhappily distracted by the struggles of the priesthood will pray that he may long be spared to deal with that institution.

The French elections occupy the French journalists, and it is almost exciting to notice the dexterous word-fencing of these accomplished champions of dialectics, many of whom display a grace and skill too little studied in England. There is scarcely a literary artifice which they do not employ to hint, or to cause to be inferred, things which it might be inexpedient to say; and delicate irony in particular, so well appreciated in France, is used with the most merciless precision. But all this sword-play is wasted, sword-play of another kind effectually supplying the antidote, and the elections will, generally speaking, be in conformity with the wishes of Government—a result which, under existing circumstances, is scarcely one to be regretted, as a different issue would simply disturb the peace of France without promoting her interests. Some of the candidates bear names recognised in England, M. Texile Delord, one of the select band who direct the sarcasms of the Charivari, offers himself, and, conditionally on his election not being allowed to interfere with his literary engagements, we must wish him every success.

There is no news from Spain more important than the fact which has plunged Madrid into woe—namely, that a favourite bull-fighter, whose arrival in the capital was to gladden all hearts, has met something more than his match in a sagaciously furious bull in the provinces, who so resented the impatience of the fighter in trying to force the death-struggle, instead of waiting until it pleased the animal to charge, that he tossed the unlucky gladiator from horn to horn, and finally inflicted a wound so ghastly that death was hourly expected. A Spaniard may reply to any irreverent English notice of such a matter that in England, on Tuesday, two notorious prize-fighters met by old appointment, advertised in the papers, and, in the presence of thousands, battered and bruised one another under a broiling sun, for an hour and upwards, until one was exhausted and gave in; and the Iberian critic may ask what is the difference between his Matador and our Tipton Slasher?

The comet, having failed in keeping the appointment made for it by the German vaticinators, is almost forgotten; but the evidences of ignorance and superstition which the prophecy elicited may as well be remembered. Instances have reached us, too, where not only have women in good social positions evinced such folly, but where—rarely, we admit—members of the other sex have disgraced themselves by apprehensions that the end of all things was fixed for Saturday last. When one hears of such unutterable folly in a class that reads books, attends sermons, and imagines itself "superior," ought we not to make every humane and Christian allowance for the weaknesses and frailties of those who have no such advantages? If we get this lesson out of the comet, it is the only way "to point its moral and adorn its (hypothetical) tail."

FREEMASONRY.—In the Freemasons' Magazine and Masonic Mirror for the present month the editor gives copious reports of the proceedings during the past month of numerous metropolitan and provincial lodges the publication of which has been sanctioned by the proper authorities, this being the commencement of a series of reports of the transactions of the Order, to be regularly continued. We need scarcely add that this authorised innovation adds materially to the interest of the magazine.

DISTRIBUTION OF THE VICTORIA CROSS.

HER Majesty has been pleased to signify to Lord Panmure, the Secretary of State for War, that it is her most gracious intention to personally distribute the Victoria Cross (the Order of Valour) on Friday next, the 26th inst. It is now determined that the ceremony of the distribution shall take place in Hyde Park, and not on the Parade facing the Horse Guards, as originally contemplated, so that a far greater number of the public may have the opportunity of witnessing the interesting proceedings. Prince Albert and all the elder members of the Royal family, Prince Frederick William of Prussia, the Archduke Ferdinand Maximilian of Austria, and a brilliant Court circle, will be present on the occasion.

THE SUPPLEMENT published with the present Number of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS contains a List of the Names of those upon whom the Victoria Cross has been conferred, and the ground on which each was selected for this honour, with Twenty-four Engravings of Acts of Bravery during the late War, and an Emblematical Border, and the Orders Printed in Colours; likewise, Lists of those who have received, for their brave conduct, the Legion of Honour and the French Military War Medal.

FRIEND OF THE CLERGY CORPORATION.—The seventh anniversary festival of this charity was held on Wednesday, at the London Tavern, Bishopsgate-street—the Right Hon. Sir John Pakington, Bart., M.P., in the chair. This society was incorporated by Royal charter for allowing pensions to the widows and orphan daughters of clergymen, and for affording temporary assistance to cases of necessitous clergymen and their families. About 160 gentlemen sat down to the dinner. The Rev. J. E. Cox, one of the hon. secretaries, read a long list of subscriptions and donations received during the year and in the room, which amounted at the close of the evening to £5000.

KING'S COLLEGE HOSPITAL.—The committee for the completion of the buildings essential for carrying out the purposes of this noble institution have taken measures for holding a public meeting in the great hall of Lincoln's-inn at two o'clock this day (Saturday, June 20), at which His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge is to preside. This hospital, which was founded in 1839, has been the means of conferring innumerable benefits on the vast population which surround it. During the last year it received 1934 in-patients, and administered medical relief to 25,814 out-patients. The large additions to the building, which commenced in 1849, have been found insufficient to meet the increasing number and necessities of the poor seeking relief; and it has been determined to raise a fund for making various alterations of a comprehensive character. It appears that a sum of £40,000 is required for the completion of the hospital, and for the current expenses for the next two years, and of this sum the committee and their friends have already contributed £16,000. The choir of Lincoln's-inn, assisted by some members of the Sacred Harmonic Society, will take part in the proposed meeting, and will perform "The Queen shall rejoice," by Handel; the "Benedictus qui venit," by Mozart, and "La Carita," by Rossini.

ROYAL WESTMINSTER OPHTHALMIC HOSPITAL, CHARING-CROSS.—The annual meeting of the governors and friends of this hospital took place on Saturday last—his Grace the Duke of Richmond, the President of the Institution, in the chair. During the year 1856, 6027 persons were admitted to the benefits of the charity; of these, 163 were admitted as in-patients. The total number of persons who have availed themselves of this hospital since its foundation in 1816 to the present time has been 146,868. The receipts of this useful charity for the past year were £944 14*s.* 6*d.*; and the expenditure £1018 4*s.* 3*d.*, leaving a deficiency of assets of £71 10*s.* 3*d.* Two wards complete in every respect are unoccupied from the want of means to provide for an extended number of patients.

THE Trinity Corporation gave their annual entertainment on Wednesday evening at the Trinity House, Tower-hill. Admiral Gordon took the chair in the absence of Prince Albert, the Master, and Captain Shepherd, the Deputy Chairman.

THE Royal Commissioners have presented their report on the site of the National Gallery. They recommend that the National Gallery shall be left where it is. There was, it is stated, only one commissioner in favour of its being removed to South Kensington.

THE second exhibition of the Royal Botanic Society was held on Thursday; and owing to the remarkable fineness of the weather the attendance was most numerous. Both as a flower show and a fashionable promenade the fête was a decided success. Three military bands—those of the 1st and 2nd Life Guards, and the Royal Horse Guards (Blue)—were in attendance.

BIRTHS AND DEATHS.—Last week the births of 824 boys and 778 girls, in all 1602 children, were registered in London. In the ten corresponding weeks of the years 1847-56 the average number was 1396. During the same period the total number of deaths registered in London was 834, of which 410 were deaths of males, 424 those of females. In the ten years, 1847-56, the average number of deaths in the weeks corresponding with last week was 951.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

HER Majesty has signified her gracious pleasure to receive the address of the Convocation of the Province and Clergy of the province of Canterbury on Saturday (to-day), at Buckingham Palace, at three o'clock. The prolocutor and clergy of the Lower House will assemble at the Jerusalem Chamber, Westminster, at two o'clock, to attend his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishops of the province, who will proceed to Buckingham Palace at half-past two o'clock.

FESTIVAL OF THE SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL IN FOREIGN PARTS.—Tuesday afternoon the 156th anniversary of this venerable society was celebrated with a full choral service in the Cathedral Church of St. Paul. This society, incorporated by charter of King William III., June 16, 1701, has now been engaged since that time in endeavouring to plant the Church of Christ among our countrymen abroad, and among the heathens. From North America its operations have gradually been extended to the West Indies, Australia, India, South Africa, New Zealand, Ceylon, and Borneo. There are now congregations in these lands under the pastoral care of 295 clergymen, of whom 460, stationed generally in the most destitute places, are assisted by the society. There have been established in the British colonies seventeen colleges, in which clergymen are educated; to fourteen of these the society lends aid. The British possessions abroad extend over a surface of about 9,000,000 square miles, and are the seats of thirty-two bishoprics in the following Right Hon. the Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress entertained the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishops, and large numbers of the clergy, at a banquet upon the occasion. The company numbered about 400. After dinner, which took place in a large marquee erected in the Egyptian Hall, Mansion-house, and of the handsomest description, after the meeting a very liberal collection was made in aid of the funds of the society.

AN examination for the degree of Bachelor of Laws in the University of London was held on Thursday and Friday (yesterday) at Burlington House.

THE new statute on Middle Class Examinations at Oxford, which was promulgated in congregation on Friday, June 5, and accepted by that body on Wednesday, June 10, was submitted to the members of convocation on Thursday, and busily carried by a large majority, as well as the title of A.A. (Associate of Arts)—the latter forming the subject of a separate vote. The following is the result of the voting:—For the entire statute Placet, 73; Non-Placet, 17. For the title, Placet, 52; Non-Placet, 36.

MR. W. BERKLEY, Scholar of Brasenose College, Oxford, has been elected to the Colquitt Clerical Exhibition. Mr. Berkley was educated at the Islington Proprietary School, as was also the previous Exhibitioner.

NEW CHURCH AT WHEATLEY.—The new church in this parish, built after the design of Mr. Street, F.S.A., was consecrated on the 10th of June, by the Bishop of Oxford, in the presence of the Bishop of Kentucky and a large company of the clergy and laity of Oxford and its neighbourhood. The population of Wheatley is large, and extremely poor, containing a great number of labourers and others belonging to the surrounding district, who, however, are not permitted to live in their respective parishes. To these and to others the new church, built by voluntary efforts, with its increased accommodation and free seats for 311 persons, will be a great blessing. It consists of a nave, with tower, the spire being shortly to be finished, chancel, north and south aisle, and sacristy. The church stands on a piece of the glebe above the village, not far from the parsonage, and will prove a pleasing object from the London road.

NEW CHURCH AT SMETHWICK.—On Monday last the foundation-stone of a new church, to be dedicated to St. Paul, was laid by J. B. Spetting Parkes, Esq., at West Smethwick, near Birmingham. The architect is Mr. G. B. Nicholls. The style is Early English, with nave, north and south transepts, and chancel, forming an octagonal apse, and with tower at the north-west angle. Accommodation is provided for 660 persons, exclusive of children. The estimated cost will be under £3000, towards which the munificent sum of £1000 is contributed by the Messrs. Chance, of the Glass Works, the remaining sum being made up by subscriptions among the inhabitants of the neighbourhood (including £1000 from the working-men of Smethwick), the land being presented by John Sylvester, Esq.

MUSIC.

THE GREAT HANDEL FESTIVAL AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

THE great celebration at the Crystal Palace, which has engrossed so large a share of the public attention has accomplished in a very satisfactory manner the objects of its projectors, and it has been an interesting musical experiment tending to the solution of various practical questions, of much importance to the future progress of the art in this country.

Last week we gave a plan of the colossal orchestra and some account of the preliminary arrangements. The proceedings of the festival commenced with a general rehearsal on Saturday morning, which was in truth a public performance, as it was attended by above twelve thousand people, who paid half-a-guinea each for admission.

The rehearsal was announced to commence at ten o'clock, and long before that hour the station at Londesborough was besieged by amateurs. The earlier steam-boats also brought the bulk of the audience. With the close of the season at this time of the year it appeared to form the subject of much admiration, as an amusement as well as the attraction they were visiting, how little is to them, I think, the first time. The admirable arrangements obviated all inconvenience or confusion.

Arriving at the Crystal Palace, its vast expansion became observable by its comparatively deserted aspect. The thousands who seemed overwhelming in the trains or at the station were completely lost in the spacious recesses of this wonderful modern architecture. Once fairly entered, and seated in a gallery of southern aspect, we were enabled to take in at a glance a tableau unequalled in beauty and magnificence. Spreading out in front of us was the leviathan orchestra, and at the centre of the chord of this immense semicircle was a neat pedestal upon which stood the conductor's baton of ivory, and the energetic wave of this potent little sceptre to awaken into life and sound the thousand voices and instruments which awaited the word of command.

The rehearsal began with the overture of "The Messiah." The effect of the instruments was excellent, the softest piano being distinctly heard, and the forte passages softened by the vast expanse. The chorus, "And the glory of the Lord," first displayed the power of the vast number of vocalists assembled, and doubts which might have been entertained as to the latter being able to make with precision. They followed Mr Costa's beat with remarkable exactness and the trueness of his ear, though less powerful than we had expected was clear and distinct in the shades which followed. For those in a position to form the power of the voice was most strangely displayed. The contrast between the mass of sound and the single voice of Mr Lockey in the words "Wonderful counsellor," was very striking. Then followed "I know that my Redeemer liveth," which received the applause of the audience in the middle of the recitative. The next recitative and chorus, "Thus saith the high and lofty One," was a most extraordinary display of choral strength and precision. The words "Lift up your heads, O ye gates," were given with a grandeur of effect which could only be produced by the most perfect combination of numbers and power. But of all the effects which we have witnessed on this occasion, we can say and the most remarkable was that produced by the words "He gave the word, great was the company that published it." It was not merely the power of the voice, but the distinctness and the precision with which every syllable was pronounced, that produced the effect. We could hear the words in the remotest part of the building. The recitative, "Behold a virgin shall conceive," was also given with great precision. The air, "O thou that tellest good tidings to Zion," is one of Miss Dolby's happiest efforts; but a low contralto voice cannot travel over a large space as a high soprano can. The air, "He shall feed His flock like a shepherd," with sweet and tender accompaniments, was heard with great effect, and the duet was also distinctly heard. The accompaniments, however, were totally lost. Then came the chorus, "For unto us a child is born," which, next to the Hallelujah, was the most splendid piece of music of the day. Mr Costa made the opening passage be sung much louder than at Exeter Hall, so that it was pretty audible, while it still left room for the grand burst upon the words, "Wonderful Counsellor!" which was uttered with a magnificence of effect. Where the voice was now heard in the recitative, "And there were shepherds abiding in the field" its clear ringing quality carried it into every corner, so that not a word was lost. The chorus, "Glory to God in the highest," was given with great precision, and the air, "Rejoice greatly," which is full of florid divisions, she was unable to give them with her usual distinctness; but she gave the slow, sustained notes in the second part with the most exquisite beauty. The pathetic chorus, "Behold the Lamb of God," which consists of a long fugue, was sung with an expression and effect which we had never heard equalled, and the passages of fugue, when at all intricate, were given with a precision and distinctness which astonished us. In the sublime chorus, "And with His stripes we are healed," there is a beautiful passage at the words "and with His stripes," which was given up by the different parts in succession in a manner not to be excelled; that, of all choruses, it is the most easily sung by great numbers of voices. Its effect on this occasion was grand beyond expression.

On the second day, Wednesday, the Queen and Prince Albert honoured the festival with their presence. They were accompanied by the illustrious strangers at present on a visit at Court—Prince Frederick William of Prussia, and the Archduke Maximilian of Austria—together with the Duke of Cambridge the Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal the Princess Alice, and Prince Alfred, and they were attended by the numerous suite composed of distinguished persons both English and foreign. Large crowds were assembled in many places on the road between Buckingham Palace and Sydenham, by which her Majesty and the Prince were to travel. When they entered the palace and the brilliant cortège appeared in the magnificent box prepared for them, a deafening shout burst from the assembly, which was repeated again and again. The Queen, the Prince Consort, the Royal children gradually took their enthusiastic seats. Reception. The National Anthem then burst from the orchestra, and the chorus of the multitude were renewed more loudly than ever. The audience then composed themselves to listen to the performance.

The oratorio was "Jesus Maccabæus" one of Handel's great compositions. With some shorter matter, selected Handel's great compositions. Its performance, on the whole was very successful, but it was still marked, though in a somewhat smaller degree, with the defects we have already pointed out.

"Pious orgies, pious airs," so expressive of quiet and resigned sorrow, was sung by Clara Novello, whose pure voice and clear utterance made a great impression. Then came the chorus, "O father, whose almighty power," one of those selected at the rehearsal on Saturday. It was still better performed now, the points being taken up with admirable firmness. It was, in the whole, the most satisfactory choral performance of the day, and was loudly applauded. The famous war song, "Arm, arm ye brave, was well sung by James, though even his voice failed to give it the requisite degree of power. He sang it, however, with firmness and vigour, and its effect was greatly increased by being fine wind-instrument passages added by Mr. Costa, who also conducted chorus, "We come," which is the response to this stirring call to arms, was effectively given; but we could not help thinking that Costa was too profuse in the use of his brazen instruments; the bursts of trombones almost wholly drowning the voices. The "Dead March" in Saul was magnificently performed. It is with this that the first part was again performed. It is still, I think, more finely performed. But the orchestra and all so blend as to make us lose from petty details, and moreover, the pausing was admirably timed and carried out that the effect was in the highest degree solemn. Miss Dolby's singing of the air, "Return, O God of Hosts," was beautiful, and was finely accompanied by the violoncello of Mr Lucas. In the chorus "Deliverance," when the time was quickened, the tone was well preserved. This was a highly successful chorus, and was loudly applauded. The grand chorus, "Hear us, O Lord, Whom we worship and adore," concluded the first part of the oratorio. It is with this that we begin the last part, was magnificently performed. It is still, I think, more finely performed. But the orchestra and all so blend as to make us lose from petty details, and moreover, the pausing was admirably timed and carried out that the effect was in the highest degree solemn. Miss Dolby's singing of the air, "Return, O God of Hosts," was beautiful, and was finely accompanied by the violoncello of Mr.

ARRIVAL OF THE GUN-BOAT LATONA AT MALTA, EN ROUTE FOR CHINA.—(SEE PRECEDING PAGE.)

OPENING OF THE BOSTON, SLEAFORD, AND MIDLAND COUNTIES RAILWAY.—GRANTHAM TO SLEAFORD.

SATURDAY last was a grand day for the county of Lincoln generally, and for the inhabitants of the towns of Sleaford and Grantham in particular, for on that day was inaugurated the opening of a branch line between those thriving little towns which must confer the greatest advantages upon that part of the country in developing the rich and industrial resources of the district. The line was opened to the public on Monday.

The new line of railway is about fourteen miles in extent, and forms part of the intended line from Grantham to the port of Boston. It has been constructed at a cost of about £6000 per mile, by the eminent contractors, Messrs. Smith and Knight.

From an early hour in the morning of Saturday the population of Sleaford were astir, and large numbers of people from Boston and other places to which the line is hereafter to be extended thronged into the thoroughfares of this cleanly and picturesque little town. The church bells commenced ringing at half-past seven o'clock, and continued their joyous peals throughout the day. At intervals a band of music perambulated through the town. All the shops and places of business were closed, and the inhabitants, men, women, and children, were invited to partake of the festivities that were liberally provided for them. At the goods station a splendid banquet was prepared for the directors, their ladies, and their friends. In the cricket-ground adjoining were erected marquees inclosing long lines of tables, upon which were profusely laid all the accessories necessary to constitute a good and substantial dinner for the working classes of the town and its neighbourhood.

By order of the directors of the Great Northern Railway Company, who have undertaken to work the traffic of the new branch, an express train, conveying a party of the shareholders and friends of Mr. Ingram, the Chairman of the Directors of the branch line, left the terminus at King's cross at half-past nine o'clock, arriving at Grantham at half-past twelve o'clock; thence they were conveyed by a special train, the engine of which was tastefully ornamented with wreaths of laurel and other evergreens, to the town of Sleaford. Their arrival was greeted with the welcoming plaudits of the population, who lined the station on both sides, and with the music of the South Nottinghamshire Yeomanry band. Amongst the assembled crowd were several hundreds of children dressed in their holiday clothes, holding flags and banners in their hands, all bearing appropriate mottoes and moral admonitions.

A procession was then formed of the directors, contractors, officials, visitors, and others, accompanied by two of the local bands, which passed through the principal streets of the town, from many of the houses of which streamed flags and banners, illustrative of the alliance formed between this country, France, Sardinia, and Turkey.

On the return of the procession to the starting-point the working men of the New and Old Sleaford, Holdingham, and Quarrington assembled under the tents erected in the cricket-field, and partook of the excellent dinner provided for them.

At five o'clock their wives and children were entertained at the same tables (which had been vacated for them) to an excellent tea, accompanied with a profusion of cakes.

At seven o'clock in the evening the masters and mistresses of the different schools of the town assembled their pupils on the cricket-field, where, after the National Anthem had been sung, under the direction of the Rev. Mr. Yerburgh, the worthy Vicar, every one of the children, amounting in all to about 700, received a silver threepence and a bun. This was not the least interesting part of the festivities of the day, which on this occasion were extended to every individual, young and old, resident in the town and neighbourhood.

The grand banquet given by the directors and the contractors took place at two o'clock, under a marquee erected on the site intended for the goods station. Herbert Ingram, Esq., M.P., the Chairman of the Directors of the branch line, presided. There were upwards of 350 persons present, including a large number of ladies, amongst whom were the following:—Mrs. A. Wilson, M.P., Mr. W. S. Lindsay, M.P., Mr. C. Chaplin, of Blankney, Mr. G. H. Packe, Deputy Chairman of the Great Northern Railway, Colonel French, M.P., Mr. Seymour Clarke, the Rev. R. Yerburgh, Vicar of Sleaford, Mrs. Herbert Ingram, Mrs. Parry, Mrs. Yerburgh, Mrs. E. Watkin, Miss Moore, Mr. Samuel Read, Mr. E. Watkin, M.P., Mr. P. O'Brien, M.P., Mr. Sheriff Mechi, Mr. Mark Lemon, Mr. Thomas Parry, Vice-Chairman, Charles Mackay, LL.D., of London, the Rev. E. Trollope, Mr. Henry Tootal, Deputy Chairman of the Boston Railway; Mr. S. E. Stephenson, C.E., Mr. George Knight, contractor; Mr. Joseph Wyles, Chairman of the Ambergate Railway; Mr. R. S. Wilkinson, Stock Exchange, Mr. M. P. Moore, Mr. W. Foster, Mr. E. Newbatt, agent to the Marquis of Bristol; Mr. W. Dolby, agent to Sir John Thorold; the Rev. James Hildyard, Rector of Ingoldsby; Mr. Henry Peake, Mr. Charles Kirk, Mr. E. Harrison, resident engineer; Mr. Charles Crampton, C.E., of London; Captain Manby, C.E., of London; Mr. A. Sturrock, of Doncaster; the Mayor of Nottingham, Mr. Peter Cunningham, of London; Mr. Shirley Brooks, of London; Mr. Thomas Wise, of Boston; Mr. M. Staniland, of Boston; Mr. W. Chapman, of Boston; Mr. R. Hubart, Mr. J. S. Cooke, Mr. Thomas Wright, &c.

Great regret was expressed that the late accident to Lord Yarborough, who had accepted the invitation, prevented his Lordship's attendance at the dinner.

Grace having been said by the Vicar, the Rev. R. Yerburgh, the usual loyal and patriotic toasts were given and responded to.

"The Army and Navy" was responded to by Colonel French, M.P.

Mr. Parry, in a complimentary speech, proposed "The health of the Members for the Southern Division of the county of Lincoln."

Mr. Wilson, M.P., returned thanks.

The Chairman said, as the next toast on the list was one in which he was personally interested, Mr. Lindsay had kindly undertaken the office of proposing it.

Mr Lindsay, M.P., said he felt that he was somewhat out of place in rising to propose what was called the toast of the day. But the Chairman, through a delicacy which he could well understand and appreciate in so large a shareholder in the undertaking the success of which he was about to propose, had deputed him (Mr. L.) to discharge that duty. In obedience to his wishes, and admiring the feeling which prompted it, he now ventured to submit that toast for their approval (Cheers); it was "Success to the Sleaford and Boston and Midland Counties Railway." (Great cheering). He was sure they would all join heartily with him in wishing success to the undertaking opened that day. A new era had arisen in the town; henceforth they were two hours nearer to the great capital of the empire than they were before. They had thus saved two hours of time, and time was capital. They had gained more than they were aware of then, but they would feel the benefit hereafter. As to what was called the direct success of the undertaking, he thought that the gentlemen who invested their capital looked to that to too great an extent. If they looked more to the indirect benefits to be derived—the unseen and imperishable advantages of a railway to such towns as this—they would find that they were far greater than the direct gains, which were too often sought for by those who invested their money in great public works. But even so far as the direct gains were concerned, in looking at the map, as he had done that day, there was no doubt, speaking as a man of experience, that those direct gains from the present line must ultimately be very great. Turn to any place, not merely in England, but look over the broad surface of Europe, the railway success perhaps in all cases had not been directly, but the success had been indirectly, great wherever the iron road had been established. It developed trade, and it opened up the districts around. The line just opened would bind the people of that town in commercial bonds with Grantham, Boston, and Nottingham, and it would make them know each other better than hitherto, because it would bring them oftener together; it would make them all richer than they had hitherto been, because it would enable them to exchange their commodities oftener and to greater advantage; it would make them wiser, happier, and better men than they had hitherto been. He called upon them, then, to join with him in wishing "Success to the Sleaford and Grantham and Midland Counties Railway."

The toast was drunk amidst the most tremendous cheers.

Mr. Chaplin then rose and said he had very great pleasure in proposing to them the next toast. It might was not the toast of the day, was very closely connected with it. He had not had an opportunity of seeing much of their line, but he had been the subject of the hon friend's observations. He could, however, with their permission, say something of the history of this new branch line. He had for years known that the traffic of this district ran from east to west, and that the railway to his native town of Boston would be a direct line, as near as it could be made, to the great industrial and manufacturing town of Nottingham. He was one of those who had joined in this scheme with some of his Ambergate friends. Mr. Wise, the banker, of Nottingham, was a strong supporter of this undertaking. The friends of this scheme had many difficulties to contend against. The general panic which followed the railway mania of 1845 had left some of its injurious effects—people were still afraid to put shares in such enterprises, and it was by no means easy to restore their confidence. Remembering all those difficulties which beset the undertaking, the railway which had just been opened showed what a determined people could do when they were in earnest. Without the assistance of what he might call the great landed proprietors of the country, the people themselves could make a railway, and could open it as they had done to-day (Cheers). He had great pleasure in bearing testimony to the hearty zeal and the public spirit of the people of Sleaford in connection with this railway, which they so well deserved. Well, after the Sleaford people they had to thank the gentlemen connected with one of the finest railways in the country—he alluded to the directors of the Great Northern Railway. The Chairman concluded by proposing "The healths of the Directors of the Great Northern Railway, and those of Mr. Packe and Mr. Chaplin."

The toast having been duly honoured,

Mr. Packe said he regretted very much the absence of the worthy Chairman of the Great Northern Railway Company. That gentleman would have attended there that day but that he was prevented by other engagements of an important character. He (Mr Packe) was much gratified with the large number of ladies and gentlemen that had come there to celebrate the opening of a railway which, though small in size, was nevertheless great in importance. He returned them his best thanks for the honour they had done him in the toast which they had just drunk.

Mr. Chaplin also briefly returned thanks.

The Chairman then called attention to the next toast, which he considered the most important of all. He had first the pleasing duty of informing the ladies and gentlemen there that this railway would be open for the public on Monday next (Cheers). The Board of Trade had decided that it might be then opened, and he could say that it was as good a line as any ever made within the United Kingdom. Being so, it was beyond the power of the Board of Trade to stop it; but, as he had stated, they had allowed it to be opened. Now, there was no use in having a railway unless it were worked properly, punctually, and safely. He had to propose the health of a gentleman who, he would say without the slightest reservation, was the greatest railway administrator of the present time—he alluded to Mr. Seymour Clarke (Cheers). He (the Chairman) had experienced the greatest kindness from Mr Clarke, who had really gone out of his way to serve them and to advance the interests of this district. He, therefore, hoped they would drink this toast with the same enthusiasm with which he would himself drink it—"The health of Mr. Seymour Clarke, the General Manager of the Great Northern Railway."

The toast was drunk with all the honours.

Mr. Seymour Clarke thanked them most heartily for the kind manner in which they had drunk his health. As a stranger, perhaps, he should be trespassing on them if he proposed a toast, but the one he would submit to them would no doubt be received with such enthusiasm that he felt he might be pardoned for his presumption. He had alluded to Mr. Ingram. He was satisfied that the feeling of the people of Sleaford was that, had it not been for Mr. Ingram—he did not say this railway would never have been made—but they certainly would not have been assembled there on that day to celebrate its opening (Cheers). They owed, then, to Mr Ingram, and to his connection with the town and port of Boston, of which he was the worthy representative, the accomplishment so far of this great undertaking. He now begged leave to propose, with all the honours to which he was so much entitled, "The health of the worthy Representative of Boston in Parliament, the Chairman of the Sleaford and Boston Railway Company, Herbert Ingram, Esq., their President on the present occasion."

The toast was received with the most rapturous applause, the entire company rising and joining most cordially in the cheers, which were again and again repeated.

Mr. Ingram said he returned Mr. S. Clarke and the brilliant assembly that had done him so much honour his deep and heartfelt thanks. He confessed that he felt a little proud that day to think that, after all the trouble and anxiety he had gone through for some years past in connection with this great undertaking, he had at last seen some part of the railway opened. They had travelled over their property that day, and they might safely say it was as good a line as any in the kingdom, as regarded its safety and general construction. He trusted he would be allowed to say that, after doing so much for Sleaford, he felt they were entitled to ask some of the gentlemen present—the landed proprietors to come forward, and to do in regard to the continuance of the line to Boston what the people of Sleaford had already done in the line just opened. If they gave their aid towards the completion of the railway, he was prepared to do his part in the matter (Cheers). They would in such case soon have the whole line to Boston opened to the public. The expense of the remainder of the projected line would be, comparatively speaking, little. He, therefore, asked the landed proprietors, if they had any spirit about them, to come forward at once to complete the whole line of railway. He thought he had a right to be supported in his efforts to extend it to his native town of Boston, which he had the honour to represent in Parliament. In conclusion, he begged to express his deep thanks for the kindness they had manifested in drinking his health.

Mr. Trollop proposed "Health and prosperity to the town of Sleaford."

Mr. Parry returned thanks, and proposed the "Health of the Engineer of the Line, Mr. George Robert Stephenson."

Mr Watkin then proposed "The Press, and healths of Dr. Mackay, the able Editor of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, and Mr. Cunningham," which was duly acknowledged by those gentlemen.

Mr. S. Clarke said he had been instructed by their worthy Chairman to propose a toast. It came somewhat late, but he was satisfied it would be received with good feeling on their parts. In proposing, then, "The health of the Contractors of the Railway," he felt he might be permitted, with the freedom of an old friend, to call attention to their merits as men and gentlemen as well as contractors (Hear, hear). It had been his office to be associated for many years with Messrs. Smith and Knight, and never had he the good fortune to transact business with men that were more honourable in the fulfilment of their engagements, more promptin their execution of them, more desirous of pleasing every body, and more zealous to carry out to the letter their undertakings, than the contractors to this new branch railway, Messrs. Smith and Knight (Cheers). He would propose then, with the greatest satisfaction, "The healths of Messrs. Smith and Knight, the worthy contractors of this railway." The toast was drunk with general acclamation. Mr Knight responded.

The Chairman then proposed "The Ladies."

Mr. Mark Lemon, having been loudly called upon, returned thanks for the ladies in his usual vein of happy pleasantry

This terminated the proceedings of the banquet, the greater portion of the company being compelled to return to London by a special train that was in waiting for them,

The vocal music was under the direction of Mr. Ransford, and was ably executed by that gentleman, Mr. Genge, Mr. Holmes, and Mr. M'Devitt.

The festivities throughout the town were, however, kept up until a late hour, the whole terminating with a grand display of fireworks.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

ALTHOUGH Mr. Greville's yearlings had by far the largest number of Orlandos among them, their sale was much less brisk than that of the Royal yearlings. The average for the former fell from 162 guineas in 1856 to 88 guineas, and the top price from 910 guineas to 210 guineas. The latter have, on the contrary, increased their average in the same period from 160 guineas to 168 guineas, and their top price from 410 guineas to 430 guineas. Seeing that the average for 1851-55 was no less than 220 guineas, breeding blood yearlings is anything but an expensive toy for Royalty. On Monday, owing to "Mr. Howard's" absence, his bidders were by no means dashing, and, as usual, the Danebury stable bought three or four. The highest-priced one—a chestnut colt by Pyrrhus the First, out of Eulogy—was bought by Mr. Richard Sutton, who won his maiden race with its half sister, Eurydice, which he bought for 76 guineas at this sale last year. A very racing-like brother to Flyaway went into Joe Dawson's stable for 200 guineas, and the Touchstone colt fetched 300 guineas, so that the Palmer-sale purchase of Trickstress has proved a wonderfully remunerative one. The Newminster colt, owing perhaps to its being rather "bred in," only reached 70 guineas—a sum hardly equal to what its looks warranted; and the fashionably-bred half sister to Voltigeur was so small, in consequence of its being an exceedingly late foal, that 66 guineas was all that could be got for her. On Monday seven of Lord Londesborough's yearlings will be sold; five of them are by West Australian, and no little competition may be expected for the half sister to Saunterer, who proved in the Ascot Cup, although he had of course been very much "hurried" since Epsom, that he can both race and stay. Some of Mr. Etwall's brood mares, and the old Safeguard (the sire of some wonderful hunters, and almost the only Defence horse left), will be sold before the Stockbridge stand, on Thursday. Sister to Ægis is among the former; and as she is only thirteen, and the dam of Andover, Antton, and Antinous, she is hardly likely to go under a strong reserve price. Few mares have paid their owner better.

Ten couple of the Cheltenham staghounds (whose committee have found no one to take the mastership) are in the market. Lord Naas will, we hear, succeed Lord Clonmel as master of the Kildare foxhounds; and there is some talk of an action in regard of the endless "Cheshire difficulty."

Mr. Morrell's show of young hounds took place at the Tulney kennels lately, and the prize for both sexes was awarded to scions of Hercules, the celebrated full-bred Yarborough hound, who was such a lion at the first Quorn sale, where Mr. Morrell purchased his lot for 210 guineas, which was far less than Mr. Richard Sutton (if he had arrived in time) would have given for the four couple, solely for the sake of securing him. Will Long and Joe Maiden were the judges, and a large and jovial party of huntsmen and whips sat down to dinner in the evening, with Clark, that nattiest of huntsmen, as president.

The success of Skirmisher in the Ascot Cup, after an immensely strong-run race, has had the effect of making Ignoramus a great St. Leger favourite; but Saunterer, who seemed as if he would have beaten anything up to the foot of the last hill, is unfortunately not in it. Adamas is to be kept, we hear, in lavender till York, where he will meet Blink Bonny on 4 lb. better terms than he did at Epsom; and on the whole, what with Dramour (if he comes sound), Arsenal, Ignoramus, Sydney, and Adamas, the little mare and Charlton will have warm work cut out for them on every side when they round the Red House turn at Doncaster. The Liverpool Cup has thirty-seven accertances out of seventy-two, which smacks of the good old times; and Mr. Tepham has cheerfully fallen in with the 8 st. 12 lb. raising-weight principle. Lattle is heard now of "Mr. Howard's" sailing off intentions, since Sedbury (a 260-guinea purchase) and Clydesdale, who is far the most racing-like two-year-old yet out, won their races at Ascot. He has no less than nine Derby horses in his stable; but he has lost his beautiful Oaks filly, who, as every one agreed when she was sold at Doncaster last year, was rightly christened Perfection. Bartholomew rode his last race at Ascot, 3 lb. on Winkfield, in the Ascot Cup, and is anxious to become a public or private trainer, for the duties of which his honesty, knowledge of pace, and eleven years' service amply qualify him.

There are four days of racing at the Curragh next week, ending with Friday. Lenham occupies Wednesday, and Newcastle commences on Tuesday, to the great delight of the sporting "black diamonds," who "revisit the glimpses of the day" especially for the purpose. Vedette (5lb. ex.) is not likely to go for the Northern Derby, and Blink Bonny (5lb. ex.) has only Syria & Shillelagh and Wardermarske as her opponents. On Wednesday Saunterer seems likely to meet and beat Lady Alice for the Grand Stand Stakes, and Skirmisher (6st. 9lb.) will no doubt do the same for Underhand (6st. 11lb.) in the Northumberland Plate. Bibury Meeting commences on Wednesday; but the Stockbridge list for the following day will shrink into small dimensions on the card. Fazzolotto seems to have an eye for Goodwood; and thus the Four-year-old Triennial will be left at Rogerite's mercy, and the Three-year-old one at Anton's. Antinous is in the Two-year-old one; and Happy Land and Vandyke, with a host of dark ones, in the Mottisfont. The Newcastle Plate boasts of the names of Zaudee, Melissa, Sir Colin, Wentworth, Rogerthorpe, Gemma di Vergy, Fisherman, Polestar, and Chevalier d'Industrie, who is likely to be busy in the front of some good race ere long: and it is rumoured that Ignoramus will come forth at last, in all his three-year-old majesty, expressly "to take the shine out of Anton" for the Stockbridge Derby - a task of no very startling difficulty.

On Monday we have Mr. Wentzell's regatta for silver vases at Kew, as well as the Wandsworth regatta. The lower eights row at Eton on Friday; that day and Saturday are devoted to the Henley-on-Thames Royal regatta; and on Saturday the Birkenhead Model Yacht Club row for £15 and smaller prizes. Fishermen will be interested to hear that a House of Commons Committee have commenced an inquiry as to the cause of the rapid decrease of salmon in the Tweed, with a view to remedy the evil, and decide on the merits of two Tweed Fisheries Bill—the one promoted by the Duke of Roxburgh, Lord Polwarth, and other proprietors of the upper parts of the river; the other by the "Tweed Shipping Company," manufacturers, and proprietors of the lower parts of Tweed, from Union-bridge to the sea. Two sets of witnesses are being examined. Those for the lower proprietors to prove that the decrease of salmon, grilse (or "tipcat-fashion" as the Committee dauntily term them), and trout is trifling, attributed to the upper proprietors; those for the lacter to prove that its is entirely caused by the practices of the former, their agents and tenants.

The matches at Lord's for next week are thus arranged.—On Monday sixteen of the University of Cambridge against the United All England eleven; on Wednesday, the Marylebone Club against the present Rugbeans; and on Thursday, Oxford against Cambridge. The Marylebone Club proceed to Harrow on Saturday, to play the present Harrovians; Surrey meets Sussex at Brighton, on Thursday; the A. E. eleven of (Nottingham) play fourteen of Sheffield on Monday, and twenty-two of Sheffield on Thursday; while the U. A. E. eleven appear on Monday at Lords against fourteen gentlemen of the Cambridge University. The Marylebone Club and ground only beat Sussex on Tuesday last by fourteen runs, and yet Caffyn, who played on the side of the former, carried his bat out in the second innings for sixty-six, or exactly the number which Sussex got in its first!

CRICKET.—The match of Marylebone Club and Ground v. the [illegible] was well contested, both sides displaying some excellent batting. The fielding also was very good. The match which was played at Lord's ground was brought to a [illegible] day, M.C.C. winning with 14 runs to spare. The [illegible] M.C.C. and Ground, first innings, 151. [illegible] on Saturday last played their first match at Blackheath, with the City Amateurs, and came off victorious. The following is the result (one innings each only being played):—Alpha Club, 93; City Amateurs, 47.

—The contest of All England eleven against Twenty-two of Liverpool, which commenced on Monday, was brought to a conclusion on Wednesday, the eleven winning by 7 runs.

AQUATICS.—THE GREAT LEANDER CLUB MATCH.—The gentlemen of this ancient and distinguished rowing club contended on Tuesday in a ran dan match, and acquitted themselves as might have been expected from their antecedents. The club has ordinarily exhibited its perfection during the season in a sedlers' contest, a four-oared race, and an eight-oared spin; and on Tuesday they commenced with the addition of a ran-dan over the old-fashioned course from Westminster to Putney. The labour was in parts excessive, owing to the height of the wind; but it was gallantly sustained Messrs Boville, Pryor, and Willoughby (London) were the victors.—The grand annual eight-oared match between the Colleges of Oxford and Eton, was rowed at Windsor on Tuesday evening. The Oxford eight were from Christchurch College. The course was from Bevency Shallows to Winsor Bridge. Eton went ahead from the first, and kept the lead the whole of the way, and won easily by three-quarters of a length. The distance, about two miles, was rowed in 11¼ minutes.

—The first sailing match of the Royal London Yacht Club this season took place on Thursday, the course being from Erith to a point near Southend, and back. The competing yachts were the Thought, 29 tons, belonging to Mr. F. O. Marshall; the Phantom, 27 tons, Mr. S. Lane; Rose of York, 22 tons, Mr. R. Clay; Zephyrius, 19, Mr. Chillingworth; Cormorant, 11, Mr. Talmadge; Mystery, 18, Mr. J. P. Downey, and Bittern, 14, Mr. T. Leach. The prize in the first class was won by the Phantom, and in the second class by the Bittern. The distance was accomplished by the former in 5 hours 14 minutes 30 seconds.

ROYAL BRITISH BANK.—Mr. Pellatt's case in reference to this bank has been considered by the law officers of the Crown; and, after a full consideration of all the circumstances, it has been determined that a more perfect bill for £6000, the amount ordered to be given by him.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

THE fact that upwards of one million sterling has been shipped this week to India and China, and the prospect of a very large remittance by the packet opportunity of the 4th proximo, have been productive of serious misgivings in various quarters as respects the future state of the Money Market. Notwithstanding that the consumption of cotton in this country is falling off, and that our export trade is less flourishing, in a comparative sense, the demand for accommodation, both at the Bank of England and at the private bankers, has been somewhat active; but we may observe that advances have been made with more than usual caution, and that inferior paper has been entirely excluded from above the Bank minimum. The rapid absorption of our import of gold—partly to purchase silver on the Continent—and the activity displayed by the agents of the Bank of France to increase the metallic stocks of that institution, in which, for some time past, they have been very successful, have had great influence upon India who operate in the English funds, and every account in reference to the produce of the silk crop in Europe is now read with avidity. The advices on this important subject are, in our opinion, quite as favourable as could be expected; yet it may be safely assumed that the total produce will not exceed three-fourths of an average quantity. But even a much larger supply would not wholly check the outflow of silver, nor have any great effect upon our money market. We must bear in mind that since 1853 India has drained the world of something like forty millions sterling in silver—imported, be it understood, not for sale, but for other productions shipped to Europe in great abundance and for the liquidation of Indian bills; and as the demand for cotton and corn will, for the former purpose, we have no doubt, be considerably increased for a long time; so that we do not expect a very early change in the rate of interest. Under these circumstances, therefore, we shall have many seasons of alarm and disquietude when the drain to the East is at its height, before the Bank of England reduced the minimum rate of discount to 3 per cent. Indeed, we shall have much pleasure in seeing that it can be done at that low rate, for our own interests will be best subserved when the rate of discount will suit the foreign exchanges, and not very clear to us that will be the case in the early part of 1858. BRANKSEA CASTLE ISLAND and ESTATE, in the Harbour of Poole, Dorsetshire

MESSRS. DRIVER have been favoured with directions to submit for SALE by AUCTION, at the MART, London, on WEDNESDAY, the 29th of JULY, at twelve, in one lot, the exceedingly valuable and highly important Freehold Property known as BRANKSEA CASTLE ISLAND, containing about 200 acres, in the Harbour of Poole, Dorsetshire. This property is within one mile of Poole, where there is a station on the South-western and Dorchester Railway, and is only a quarter of a mile from a point of the main land of the county of Dorset, and thus easily accessible. The island is well situated and commands a noble Norman castle site, now badly out, crowning the sea, and commanding the bar of the Harbour. There are manorial rights and interests connected with the property, and numerous direct log-houses, a productive servitor or most-guard station, there are also farm buildings and premises, most capable of improvement, comprising several acres well planted and inclosed, an elegant sliding temple, fresh-water lakes, abounding with fish and well-stored with poultry or game. A considerable portion of the island is in part wood, and a further portion could be easily brought into the There is also a village called Maryland, on the other part of the island, a new church, fitted and completed in a most elegant manner, has lately been erected and endowed at considerable cost; a Rectory-house capable of being let has been recently built on the property land, formerly intended for the parsonage. About 110 acres, chiefly near the Castle, have been recently reserved, reclaimed, and thoroughly embanked and when in meadow will form an important feature. The inland bottles in residential, has a warm sheltered and character: It abounds in pottery and clays also of the best and purest quality, the fire-brick and fire-lump clays, the sand for glass making, terra-cotta clay (pure clay), marl for land, and other valuable materials abundance. Ireland extensive building, and which is on the surface of the estate, and extending to a considerable depth. The manufacturing premises comprise the fire-brick works, pottery works, brick-yards, tile and lime kilns, worked by steam-engines and other machinery, together with all the necessary materials on them, to work in the usual manner of buildings and premises, besides which there are a railway running one part, timber, and of the island, connecting the whole of the clay, &c., ground, with the numerous sheds, and premises, also communicating with the pier fronting and a steam water that vessels of 200 tons can load and discharge. The railway is carried on the pier to the landing place, on which is a tramway, by which three vessels can load and unload at the same time. There are many other features connected with this valuable and important island. Suffice it to say that from its peculiar nature, both physical and commercial values can at all times only be enjoyed with at the least harbourage with each other. Distinct specifications, with descriptive plans, and maps, &c., may be had of Weston Agent, Esq. Solicitor, Chancery Lane; of Messrs. Driver, 10 Tavistock-street, Covent-garden; of Messrs. Driver, 10 Tavistock-street, Westminster; and of Messrs. Driver, Surveyors, Land Agents, and Auctioneers, Whitehall, London, S.W., at whose offices samples of the clay and other materials may be seen.

EXHIBITION SUPPLEMENT.

We this day publish our Annual Supplement of Engravings, selected from the most popular works in the Picture Exhibitions of the season. These specimens are from the collections of the Royal Academy and the Societies of Painters in Water-Colours.

We have in preceding numbers examined all the various departments of the great National Exhibition at the Royal Academy, excepting the Miniatures and Sculpture, which form the subject of the first of the following articles and our last notice of the Exhibition in Trafalgar-square.

We next conclude our observations upon the landscape works of the New Society of Painters in Water-Colours. Then follow descriptive, rather than critical, notices of the pictures here engraved. We have already reported our impressions of the Society of Painters in Water-Colours and the other exhibitions—that of the British Institution, the National Institution, the Society of British Artists, the French Artists, &c.—at the time of their opening to the public.

Taking a general retrospective view of the art productions of the year, and comparing them with those of last year, the most regretable feature is that there is scarcely a single new name; while last season several artists previously unknown immensely distinguished themselves. Some or our artists, however, whom we thought hopelessly at low-water mark, have had quite a spring tide. A very satisfactory circumstance is that there is greater evidence of artists beginning to think, and at last to give up some of the more hackneyed themes. But, if commercial principles and the laws of demand and supply have any influence upon the development of art, there never was a more encouraging period than the present. Pictures are everywhere sold with amazing rapidity. For example, the works in the Galleries of the Painters in Water-Colours were nearly all sold at the "Private View;" as were also a great proportion of those in the other exhibitions.

EXHIBITION OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

THE MINIATURES, SCULPTURE, &c.

There is an evident falling off in the number of miniatures this year, and some of the better-known artists are scarcely equal to themselves. The decrease in the number of contributions of this class is attributable to the fact that many of our incipient, or rather pseudo, miniature-painters are employed to colour photographs. We think this is to be somewhat regretted, since such practice will utterly preclude any real progress in art; and we may see an extremely pleasing and eminently English branch of art undeservedly neglected. There will, however, probably be to some extent a reaction when the real character and unavoidable shortcomings of photographic portraiture (as so ably explained in an article in the last number of the Quarterly Review) are better understood; and, above all, when more general good taste eschews those nondescript productions coloured photographs—productions which have neither the beauty of art nor the approximate truth of science, which are neither picture nor photograph, and whose dauby meretriciousness fades in a few months from the chemically-prepared surface which it covers.

Among the miniature-painters Sir William Ross, R.A., still excels in the higher qualities. He is very truthful in resemblance, exquisite in feeling and expression, delicate and transparent in colouring, and masterly in drawing. He is more than ever remarkable for freedom of handling, laying himself as it were open before you in order to prove that the most exquisite effects may be gained by means which appear the simplest. The charming portrait of "Mrs. Cairnes" (792) is distinguished by all these qualities; and No. 796 is not far behind it. In the latter, however, we remark what is becoming rather conspicuous in the miniatures of Sir W. Ross—viz., that the colouring of the flesh appears sometimes in patches, occasioned partly by his using too much blue in the local parts in his extreme anxiety to give delicacy, and thus losing the more advantageous use of blue in modelling the receding parts; indeed, he frequently appears to ignore this use of his pearly tint altogether. There are several small miniatures by Sir William placed together, among which the sad sweet face of the "Empress of the French" (744) will be distinguished. The wonderfully-apprehensive look of the "Dowager Viscountess Hardinge" (775), and the very pleasing girlish grace and the archly-elevated eyebrow of "Lady Louisa Hamilton" (778), will not fail also to command admiration.

The style of Mr. Thorburn, A.R.A., s so entirely distinct from that of Sir William Ross that they are in no sense rivals. Mr. Thorburn has, with much originality and considerable fancy, unequalled breadth, depth, and power. But the latter qualities cannot, we think, be obtained without sacrificing some of the peculiar and distinctive charms of miniature-painting. When the ivory is loaded and covered with paint, its exquisite surface and warm, delicate semi-transparency are in a great measure lost. Of course, if an able and original artist, which Mr Thorburn undoubtedly is, aims at obtaining the effect of oil painting in water-colour, he will surely succeed in giving us power in pictures. But if power and breadth are his objects why not paint with a vehicle which would give these qualities in a far greater degree and in immeasurably less time? All Mr Thorburn's pictures for some years past have shown this year improvement in drawing and in drilling. "Lady Scott" (762) is his best work; and that to artist interests us very much with its face but nothing can be finer than the sculptured pose, the classical arrangement of the rich drapery, and the splendid colouring and intensely gorgeous tone of the lower part. "The Countess of Kintore" (738) is very refined in expression, but the sky is too blue even for the fair hair. The portrait of "Mrs Monnes Sutton" (745) is also fed in miniature, but it is unusually broad and round in effect, and the hands and arms are extremely beautiful in form and sentiment, though there is a little license in the tapering of the errant fingers. The attitude of "The Countess of Mountcharles" (781) is not right, and the artist has not done justice to his subject.

Mr. Wells ranks high for drawing, colour, and composition; though breadth of effect is sometimes diminished by a little edginess. The pensil is best carried even into the hands, and the glow of soft light in the eye, render the portrait of "Miss Cameron" (747) perhaps the best work by this artist but there are several others of great merit.

Mr Thorn's portrait of "Lady Smith and Child" (805) is not an improvement. The equal and minute execution realising everything so tangibly gives the whole a set stiffness, and the mind is as it were chained to the actual result gained.

All Mr. T. Carrick's miniatures are characteristic and life-like; and the portraits of "W. Wilson, Esq." (798), and "J. Steele, Esq" (812), show progress, and are less monotonous in colour than Mr Carrick is apt to be.

Mr. Gullick's large ivory miniature head of "J. Timbs, Esq., F.S.A., author of 'Curiosities of London,' &c." (701), is broadly yet carefully and delicately elaborated, and must be a good likeness; but it is not up to "exhibition pitch" in effect.

There is great animation and character in a miniature by Mr. Basebe (No. 741, and we remember the works of the following artists to the notice of the admirers of this charming and thoroughly English branch of art:—Messrs. Cave, Messrs. Giles, W. Egley, Watson, Cruikshank, Gray, Hatton, and Miss A. Dixon.

Among the water-colour drawings we would especially mention the very pleasing full length portrait of "Miss Louisa Mackean" (644). The artist, Mr Goddard, was fortunate in his subject; and, although the execution is a little mechanical, the general effect is very pure and beautiful.

"Lieutenant A. R. W. Thistlethwayte," with its Crimean background (874), and "Mrs. E. J. Smith" (945), by Mr. Gullick, are good in colour, and their painstaking conscientiousness deserves recognition among the flimsy speciousness of a great deal of the portraiture on paper.

The little girl, by Mr. Wells, in No. 938, is very charming; and almost equally so the child, by Mr. Moore, in No. 910.

Mr. G. Richmond's crayon drawing it would be supererogatory to praise. The public will, however, be more than usually curious about Mr Richmond when they know that Mr Ruskin has engaged this artist's portevarun, and the critics head is here to extend his popularity, we might almost say notoriety. There is also a crayon portrait of another literary gentleman, "Mr Sidney Dobell (685), the author of the "Roman." Dobell" (685), the drawing by Mr. Archer. The crayon performances of Messrs Harwood, Martin, Wells, Havel, and Chalmondeley, have much merit

The engravers seem desirous of showing their appreciation of the recent recognition of their claims by contributing a greater number of works than usual. Among these the magnificent engravings of the Emperor and Empress of the French, by Mr Cousins, R.A., and the lithograph of Helen Faucit, by Mr. Lane, A.E., are perhaps the most noticeable.

The collection of sculpture is poor beyond all precedent Year after year the shameful slight put upon the purest form of art, by confining it in a den of the most sinister aspect, is brought prominently before the public; and yet year after year passes by without any amelioration of what is so prejudicial to art generally -for to sculpture is intrusted the great art-canons—and so unjust to the artists themselves. We need not wonder, then, at the present meagre display. Not being endowed with a feline power of dilating the pupils of our eyes, we cannot pretend to give a very definite description of the phantom forms confined in this shadowy Hades; but, after spending some hours in these "shades below," we will state the impressions we received in the cunnieran gloom with acclimated vision.

The bust of the Queen by Mr. Noble deservedly occupies the best place in the room The likeness is very striking, and it is, if we may be permitted to say so, very elegantly idealised Queenly dignity is blended with the quiet self-reliving grace of the English lady. There is another finely characteristic bust of Admiral Lord Lyons by Mr Noble.

There are models here of the colossal statues of Fox, by Mr Baily, R.A., and Chatham, by Mr Mac Dowell, R.A., which have been erected in St. Stephen's Hall, the new Palace at Westminster; but, as they have been engraved and described already in our pages, we need not allude to them further. The large group by Mr. Baily of "Adam Consoling Eve after the Evil Dream" (1209), from the passage in Milton, is not one of the artist's most successful works; yet much human emotion is embodied, taking into consideration the cold vehicle and the classical types. The grouping, Adam standing Eve on his knee, is not particularly felicitous, rendering impossible any grand lines of composition, though the detail is of course managed with the highest skill of a master.

"The Young Naturalist" (1216), by Mr Weekes A.R.A., represents a girl on the sea-shore seeking to extend her knowledge among the Stellerida she has an asterias or star-fish in her hand The wind tosses about her hair and dress, and the artist has very boldly attempted to represent these; but the amount of genius can convey the impression of lightness and buoyancy to detached masses of so heavy a material. Sir Joshua Reynolds ably pointed this out in the statues of the Apostles in the Church of St John Lateran at Rome Apart from this the statue is of the highest excellence The face is exquisitely modelled, and the whole figure full of select imitation of nature; but the nailed: are perhaps rather heavily defined. "The Mother's Kiss" (1218) is beautifully composed, but the whole figure is not quite rightly balanced. There is also a very life-like bust by Mr Weekes, No. 1272.

A work distinguished by some of the higher sculptural qualities, although not without minor defects, is contributed by Miss Hosmer, a young American lady, who has been studying some four years in Mr. Gibson's studio at Rome, and promises to become as distinguished in this branch of art as Rosa Bonheur is in painting The subject is "Beatrice Cenci Asleep in her Cell the Morning before her Execution" (1211). From the simplicity of the modern the subject is far more legitimate than when the whole of her horrible story is elaborated, as in Shelley's drama The face of Beatrice is a great success, and perfectly reveals that unexpressibly pathetic expression in her portrait by Guido in the Barberini Palace at Rome. The attitude, or rather, the disposition of the limbs, is awkward and sleep is not naturally represented, for there is effort about the neck. The introduction of the pillow is not in good taste, and, if introduced, the head should be more sunk in it. The manipulation, however, is admirable The statue is executed for the Public Library of St. Louis.

"Triumphant Cupid" (1221), by Mr. J. Geefs, represents Cupid, as it were, taking a little run and leap preparatory to his enlevement of Psyche, or the beautifully-chiselled, but too plump and contorted, figure which stands for that exquisitely poetical but most impalpable thought. The face of Eros beams with delight; and the perfect abandonment of Psyche, who is already on the wing, sufficiently proves his triumph complete, although their fingers touch over each other's head with a little of the toilet affectation Few things are oftener attempted by sculptors than the embodiment of the idea of Psyche but it is an idea which we think can but float indistinctly in the imagination, and is altogether too spiritual and transcendental to render embodiment possible, and again the God of Love may be content with it as it is.

Lastly, Mr. Foley's latest statue of "Innocence" is too puerile would be expressing ourselves tautologically; but there is certainly a distinction—which the artist has ignored—between the trivial and the silly and the most infantine expression of innocence. This is the only specimen of the application of polychromy to sculpture, and is far from pleasing, apart from the question of its æsthetic propriety The Lar is stained of a warm hue, touched here and there with gold the flesh is tinted of a warm hue, and a delicate border is run round the edges of the drapery. The Greek sculptors of the best period is true, were usually coloured their statues, but there is every reason to presume that this was done merely in deference to the popular religious prejudices which, having been formed, as M. Rubichi has remarked, through familiarity with the early painted Daedalian wooden figures, the popular mind came to consider certain colours as emblematical of the attributes of their deities. When, also, a modern Greek like Mr. Gibson colours his Venus in blind imitation of antiquity (and we hear he has recently had the ears of his goddess to attach earrings, besides presenting her with other trinkets), there is some little excuse. But to colour a simple little figure like this—of innocence, too, above all things—is simply ridiculous. It looks like a large piece of confectionery. The remaining figures being merely plaster models, we shall curtail our remarks.

To the representation of "Titania" a similar objection applies as to Psyche We admire Mr. Earle's gracefully-recumbent figure (No. 1219), but he might as well attempt to chisel the lightest cloud tipped by summer moonlight as to try to block out in marble the evanescent being of the "Midsummer Night's Dream."

The most promising and dramatic work is certainly "The Hard" (1225), by Mr. Theed, to be erected in the Egyptian Hall in the Mansion House. The conception is entirely worthy Gray's magnificent ode.

Mr. Bell's "Pandora" (1224) is an interesting figure and nicely modelled, but the casket does not much help its want of meaning

We humbly submit that a classical subject should be classical in character and sentiment; but the last work, and "Proserpine" (1228), by Mr. Wood, are neither. The latter also, without being hypercritical, does not sufficiently explain itself.

Mr Leifchild's colossal fugitive (white?) Nigger, attacked by a bloodhound, is a most unfortunate, and in very deed a monstrous, mistake

"Echo" 1226), by Mr Wills, though the action of the hands is a clever conceit, is not romantic, but Louis Quinze in taste

The statuette "The Bather" (1246), by Mr. Marshall, R.A., is a poor conception. With the point of the toe actually brought into a line with the leg, the action of the gastrocnemius muscle should be more marked.

Mr Munro's "Hippocrates" (1232) is intensely thoughtful, though scarcely the type of a philosopher. "The Sisters" (1309) are natural and exquisitely sweet in expression; and a bust of "Dr. Acland" (1280) has beautifully calculated surface.

Among the portrait busts, "Lucetta"—from Sir E. B. Lytton's "God dphin (1275), by Mr. Lowther, is distinguished by great refinement of expression. The face is sadly tender, the spirit being, as the French happily express it, recueillie, as is gracefully indicated by the bowed head and the pitifully-drooping eyelids By the same artist is a colossal bust of himself (1254), which is as powerful in character as the first is gentle in sentiment. "Nora Creina (1272), and "Lesbia" (1277), from Moore, by Mr Halse, realise the characters of the poet, which are, however, of hardly sufficient dignity for commemoration in marble. "Lyric Poetry" (1317), by Mr. Ambuch seems to deserve a far better place than it is extremely difficult to judge of the relative merits of the busts, placed as they are almost in contact, and therefore mutually destroying the effect of each And this especially applies to the portrait works, which it is necessary above all things to be able to see from every point, in order to discover the most characteristic aspect, which is generally on the right side. We may, however, say confidently that "Mrs Beecher Stowe" (1334), by Miss S. Durant, is a work of the highest excellence, that Mr. Brodie's "Tennyson" (1353), in Parian marble, is a literal and forcible resemblance; that the late "Richard Sheepshanks" (1340), by Mr. Foley, A.R.A., is wonderful as a posthumous work; and that "Sir H. Stacey" (1342), by Mr Mac Dowell, R.A., is broad and masterly.

Besides the works of portraiture we have already mentioned incidentally there is a pleasing bust of a full length statue of the late J. H. Vivian, M.P., by Mr. Thomas; and some good busts by Messrs. E. G. Papworth (junior), Lucas, Behnes, Edwards, Adams, Butler, Fontana and Richardson.

Mr Walther exhibits striking medallion likenesses of Tennyson, Browning, and Curtis The artist has a bust of the Poet Laureate has been sent to Manchester, but we shall shortly present our readers with an Engraving of this very remarkable work.

Finally, there are two expressive and beautiful bassi-relievi, by Messrs. Miller and Edwards

"EVENING HOUR."—PAINTED BY CARL HAAG.

FROM THE EXHIBITION OF THE SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER-COLOURS.

THANK you, Herr Carl! as Mr. Ruskin would, or might, or at least should say (for, judging merely from a recent pamphlet, it is very difficult to guess what that gentleman's opinion would actually be upon any given subject); thank you, Mr. Haag, let us call you, for it is time you were naturalised and one of ourselves We find this, to our mind, the richest and most effective work from your full, free, and glowing pencil, which we recollect to have greatly admired that picturesque ragged young goatherd, with crook and calabash, pushing away so heartily at his great goat-skin bag and Calabrian pipe, as if to celebrate, like a devout Parsee or Peruvian, the setting of the sun And absolutely sacred is that flood of lively music he squeezes forth, compared to the nervous torture of that Scotch instrument at which we suppose drives Highlanders to the very end of the earth, and the "screech" from which Haydon says, "was as if all the devils in Hades were trying to sing through their noses, while squeezing them with their fingers and thumbs and yet," he adds, and we must admit, "the sound is original and peculiar." Thought as young pifferaro is mounted on a portion of the half-buried entablature of some noble edifice, which stood erect and stately when Rome spread itself over many a mile of the now desolate and pestilential Campagna, where nothing, save herds of goats and grey buffaloes range and feed How suggestive that fragment of elaborately-polished stone of the departed glory, the might, the majesty of ancient Rome! The "evening hour" effect of the picture is, also, so perfectly in keeping with the sentiment, embodied as it were in that richly-ornamented though degraded fragment of Roman splendour long has past, but golden reflections yet beautify and hallow the soil and atmosphere suffuse the atmosphere with blushing light, and linger in the quivering exhalations which rise from the panting earth after the sun's fond and fierce regard

And "Young Italy" may well raise mournful Memnonian melodies, commemorative not only of the magnificence of its departed greatness, but also a requiem for the death of its liberty, and a dirge for almost all that a nation holds dear. Once since her ancient glory Italia found expression for her awakened and elevated feelings in the language of art and the noblest flights of genius; but she soon sank, apparently, almost into her former lethargy. Does it not prove, however, the heart of the nation is even now the same, since she pours forth once in such sweet strains and all the nations delight to listen to her? Play on, then thou young piper, though thy music is not the choicest specimen and thy audience certainly not so considerable, and let us hope, though the sun of empire is travelling westward, and perhaps to a new continent, that Italy may yet find enough vitality to start, and that soon, into one united nation—free, if not great and glorious.

GLASGOW CATHEDRAL.—PAINTED WINDOWS.—A meeting of the subscribers to the scheme for filling in the windows of Glasgow Cathedral with painted glass was held on Friday, the 8th inst. The Lord Provost narrated the proceedings of the committee, and stated that they had come to the conclusion that the Munich artists were superior to all others in the department of glass-painting. It was ultimately agreed that the committee be appointed a working committee to carry out the scheme. On the suggestion of Mr. G. Crawford, as representing the Trades' House, the committee was instructed to introduce subjects illustrative of the Reformation, so as to give the cathedral more decidedly the character of a Protestant church.

BRITISH INSTITUTION.

THE annual Exhibition of the Works of the Old Masters and deceased British Artists opened at the Gallery in Pall mall to the public on Monday last. Compared to the choice display of last year, the pictures are not, on the whole, of so high a character, which is no doubt attributable to the number of "art-treasures" sent to Manchester. The Exhibition will, however, be equally interesting to the general visitor inasmuch as there are large and fine specimens of the various schools in their more advanced stages of development; although, with some three or four exceptions, the art-student and connoisseur will find fewer data for deduction and analysis and less material for historical and chronological classification. Works, for instance, which in a richer collection would only be arranged as "gallery pictures" (but that are, nevertheless, the best of their kind) are here placed on "the line."

"Our Saviour receiving the Soul of the Virgin" (64) is a small picture by Giotto, in extraordinary preservation, from Mr. Davenport Bromley's unequalled collection of early Italian art. It is a beautiful specimen of the ingenuous religious feeling of true pre-Raphaelite art. St. Joseph partly supports the outstretched body of the Virgin, while her spirit has ascended, and, in the conventional form of a little child (as adopted at the period), stretches out its hands as if for a more close embrace in the arms of our Saviour, who is merely placed a little above the couch. One of our Lord's brethren kneels in front, another wrings his hands beyond, and the Apostles, intermingled with angels, stand around A characteristically simple and humble may be observed in that while an elder is reading some service from a book with Hebrew characters, others are employed, together with angels, performing the offices of the Romish Church—such as sprinkling holy water, and bearing wax tapers and censers. The picture illustrates the advance made in composition by Giotto We see for the first time since the decline of ancient art a successful attempt made at the regular disposition of the subject in the space allotted. An angel holding a candle, and another arranging the grave-clothes, are very beautiful. Vasari has described this work, and states that it was especially praised by Michael Angelo.

At the head of the North Room is one of the finest specimens of Guercino we have seen (No. 4). The subject represents "St. Louis di Gonzaga and an Angel," whom he is said to have seen in a vision, and who stands pointing to an altar on which is placed a crucifix. This vision so impressed the mind of the saint that, though heir to the Duke of Mantua, he resigned his right of succession, and entered the society of Jesuits. He is already invested in the habit of the order, and he has thrown his ducal crown behind him. A cherub is descending with a less perishable diadem, and a heavenly orchestra celebrates his pious resolution For works of this preeminence and profile, but frequently commonplace, master are so elevated in feeling, or so satisfactory in expression. The colouring is brilliant, the design grand yet simple, and the general effect imposing, without violence of contrast. Another picture by Guercino, "Esther before King Ahasuerus" (46), is also distinguished by fine qualities, but the energy of the shadows has degenerated into a foxiness of tone. This picture is from the Duke of Northumberland's collection, and it is due to his Grace to mention that he has been an extremely liberal contributor, though some of the works have only recently been purchased. "Il Riposo" (14), by Murillo, is remarkable for the superior types of the heads—being far more generalised and less Spanish than usual; but, above all, for its sanctity of sentiment and exquisite sweetness of tone The solicitude of St. Joseph and the Virgin, and the childlike interest of the attendant cherubs, are very beautifully expressed, but the fascination of its colouring and its pervading suavity of effect would alone give it high value. A small "Assumption" (9), by Murillo, is also very fine in colour.

Titian does not in this Gallery assert his supremacy as a colourist A small replica of "Venus endeavouring to dissuade Adonis from the chase," in the National Gallery (6), is certainly rich and broad in the local flesh tints; and a "Female Head" (7) in addition to being a wonderful piece of foreshortening, is delicate in gradation and tender in tone, but the portraits are unusually negative in hue. The "Portrait of an Admiral (16), is, however, remarkable for its expression of conscious vigilance and sternness of character, whilst a "Man with a Hawk" (11) has splendid intensity of tone. The superb richness of effect and true Italian glow of Giorgione are united to his breadth of style in the well-known "Female at a Well" (41), from the collection of the Royal Academy.

"Jethro and the Shepherd" (36), by Ludovico Carracci, and a large landscape (No. 42), grand in composition and in its masses of light and shade, by Domenichino, are both interesting—especially the latter.

Besides two or three very finely-expressive heads, and a small study for the large picture at Bologna, there is a noble work by Guido—"The Baptism of Christ" (15). The colouring is more than usually positive and brilliant, but the nude figures are too equally relieved

The student of art will take especial interest in a few of the following works For instance, there is a portrait of "Sebastian del Piombo" (7), by Rosso Fiorentino, a painter of the Florentine school but little known. The picture has, besides, something of Venetian fulness of effect. "Head of a Maiden" (20), a small work by Ridolfi Ghirlandajo, the son of the early and eminent Florentine painter. Though somewhat dry in execution, the gradations are refined, and the expression has much of the sweetness of Raphael's early works. A small work, "Martyrdom of Saints" (29), is assigned to Raphael himself; but it is not mentioned in Passavant's list of the great painter's works, nor in any other with which we are acquainted; and from internal evidence, if by Raphael at all, it must be a very youthful production of the Pietro Perugino period. The extraordinary early work by Correggio, "The Holy Family" (39)—so bad in drawing yet so strong in effect—formerly in Rogers's collection, is in this exhibition. There is also a very interesting work by the Ferrarese master, Garofalo, "Our Saviour Casting out Spirits" (17), a "Holy Family" (10), by Bonfazio, and "The Virgin and Child" (36), by Palmer, an early, exquisitely finished, and picturesque work of small dimensions.

"The Virgin and Saints" (30) is a fine example of Cima da Conegliano the successful follower, according to Ridolfi, of the style of Giovanni Bellini The type of the Virgin's face is not so conventional as even later art Specimens of the works of better-known artists of the southern schools are in the room, those by A Carracci, Salvator Rosa, Spagnoletto, Snyders, Tintoretto (of some but doubtful genuineness, we think, Carlo Dolci, Paul Veronese, &c., but they are not particularly important.

Turning to the northern schools, we find Rubens worthily represented "View of a Château, with Figures" (100), is a small landscape, quite indescribably lovely in colour. A sparklingly fresh and perfectly transparent, yet glowing, atmosphere suffuses the scene; and every object reflects, as it were, gem-light of variegated hues through the translucent medium. The water is crystal itself, with its fairy-like reflections held in liquid suspension As specimens of the portraiture of Rubens, the candid face in No. 30, and the admirably-painted head in No. 39, are not unfavourable examples; but, as an instance of the painter's affluence of power for the representation of figures vigorously engaged, nothing he has even done himself surpasses "A Wolf Hunt" (102). The wild tangle of the composition, the force of the colouring, the dash of the execution, and the extreme animation of the figures, displayed, however, without loss of dignity, are beyond all praise "Diana and her Nymphs" (56) is an example of the large mythological compositions of the painter. But the copious redundancy of the Flemish man in Rubens's pictures is singularly inappropriate for the classical goddess of the chase, especially when one thinks of that tall, slender, agile figure in the Louvre.

Vandyke comes very near his master in style and execution in "Christ Betrayed" (12), and the expression in the heads surpasses many similar works by Rubens. The face of our Saviour is very full of the touching gentleness of the agony in the garden, and as Judas is about to kiss his cheek the human nature seems to say "How can you betray me?" while, subduing this, Divinity is eloquent in "Not my will but thine be done!" There are several portraits by Vandyke, distinguished by his well-known grace and refinement, but none demanding very especial consideration.

By Rembrandt there is the celebrated Portrait of his Mother (69). The character, the intensity of settled expression in the face, and the truth to unaffected nature are very extraordinary. But, though there is the customary aim at forcing the chiaroscuro to the utmost limit, the effect of illusive liquid depth is not so astonishing as usual, and the colouring in parts is quite livid. "Portrait of a Female" (87) is, however, admirably modelled and relieved by the light and shade. The frank expression of the face is also quite charming.

The free, dexterous handling and the variety of Teniers are seen to advantage in a village "Merry-making" (83) in the open air, with its numerous figures; but his command over expression is far more conspicuous in "The Gazette" (122). The execution is also of the painter's choicest quality—not in the least laboured or overloaded on the one hand, or, on the other, so thinly painted as to leave the play of the pencil visible in opaque smears over the shade preparation, or exact anything from the eye. "Courtship" (114) is equally droll, but, being more carefully worked up, is rather harder and colder. Its sparkling lights are, however, touched with magical delicacy and precision.

A small "Merry-making" (70), by Jan Steen, is even more remarkable for boisterous, drunken fun and inventive humour than the two large pictures exhibited last year. It would occupy far more space than we have at our disposal to describe the extreme variety of its comic but not coarse incidents, or even to do justice to the merits of its execution. Simply the opinion expressed by a recent biographer, that this able and industrious painter, although he represented drunken scenes, was not himself the sot he has been thought, is well founded.

The name of Hobbima carries with it the guarantee of high excellence, but we find, nevertheless, No. 84 comparatively heavy and uninteresting. Two pictures by Ruysdael are very striking and poetical. A "Landscape and Figures" (79) is especially remarkable for the impressive manner in which the knarled trunks of the oaks come out against the pale soft light of the evening sky. The elaboration of the whole picture is highly descriptive in character. No. 96 is also picturesque in composition, grand and solemn in feeling and tone. "A River Scene, with Men-of-War and Boats" (88), is an excellent W. Vandevelde, full of Dutch coldness, but equally full of Dutch accuracy and observation. Berghem and Both are likewise here, and a picture by the French master Le Sueur. To the curious we commend the very interesting portraits, by Mabuse, of "Henry VII.," &c. (73).

The exhibited works by deceased British artists are principally portraits, and we get some pleasant introductions to a few of the celebrities of the latter part of the last century and the beginning of the present. Here are Dr. Johnson, stooping and concentrated, by Gainsborough; General Paoli, with shaggy yellow eyebrows and mechanically-drawn eyes peering from under them; and Mrs. Siddons, painted as if for the stage certainly, but looking anything but a tragedy queen, by Lawrence. Here are Vestris "Le Dieu de la Danse," and Paul Methuen, the picture-collector, both by Gainsborough; and the artists Benjamin West and Sir William Beechey, with Judge Garrow, painted with finished delicacy by Harlow. There are full-lengths of Hayley, the biographer of Cowper and the poet of painting, &c.; his son, and little Flaxman, the sculptor; all on one canvas, by Romney; and the artist's own burly head and laughing face looking in at one corner of the picture. Here are Nelson, Sterne, and "the chief warrior of the Mohawk nation of Indians commonly called Captain Brandt, 1779"—anexcellent portrait by Stewart—besides others of less note.

Every display of this kind, inviting a comparison of our portrait-painters, leaves us with a deeper impression of the false refinement and meretricious taste of Sir Thomas Lawrence, whilst Sir Joshua Reynolds, both often, as here, extremely unequal, constantly grows in our respect and admiration. The best work by Reynolds is a superb full-length of Lady Compton (139) of a very rich tone, but a fresher piece of colouring is the charming "Family Portraits" in No. 111. Romney also rises in our estimation, and but for their rather brick-like colouring, the truthful character in No. 148, and the beautiful face in No. 111, would be perfect. A sketch of a head (142), by Gainsborough, is of extreme delicacy of colour, and fully equal in refinement to Vandyke. The large picture, "Hubert and Prince Arthur in the Prison" (144), by Northcote, is too well known, by the engravings of it and otherwise, to require particular comment.

Besides the names of contributors we have already mentioned incidentally, the liberality of the following noblemen and gentlemen also demands especial recognition, viz., Lord Methuen, J. Grant, Esq., Viscount Enfield, W. Stuart, Esq., Earl Spencer, Gen. Sir W. Gomm, Hon. C. C. Cavendish, and Lord Overstone.

EXHIBITION OF THE NEW SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER COLOURS.

[SECOND AND CONCLUDING NOTICE.]

MR. VACHEE has returned from a tour in Algeria, and in this Exhibition we have several effective pictures from his portfolio of sketches. "Arabs passing the Atlas" (146)—or rather the highest peak of the Kabyle or Lesser Atlas, North Africa—is a very fine work, and full of light. The mountain forms, resembling the "chopping" waves of an angry sea, are very remarkable. We do not wonder, to look at them, that these mountains afford almost inaccessible fastnesses for the tribes, against which the French are even now compelled to send expeditions. The Arabs in the foreground, the flowering aloe by the road-side, the date palm, and other characteristically local objects, together form the subject for a picture quite out of the beaten track. The view of "The City of Algiers from the Road to Beer Mandreia" (160), is almost as striking as the coup-d'œil of the city, with its terraces apparently piled on each other in sport, as seen from the sea. The representation of the "Environs of Mesilah with the Tomb of Sidi bou Saad, Algeria" (111), shows at a glance nearly as much of this country, its climate, its atmosphere, and even the manners and customs of its inhabitants, as can be gleaned from many a book of travel. A party of Arabs are squatted down in the front plane of the picture, discussing their hookahs al fresco. Other Bedouins are preparing to start upon a journey on some camels—those, to Europeans, ugly, unaccountable animals. No. 295 is a flood of golden light; and the "First Hour of Night," in No. 15, is poetically observed, with the rising purple mist so nicely contrasted against the still-glowing sky.

No. 197, by Mr. Sutcliffe, is a picture deserving closer examination than can be easily devoted to it from its unfair hanging. The delicacy of its feathery touch, so sharp and descriptive, and its close observation and knowledge of nature, are especially noteworthy.

All Mr. Cook's pictures are full of aerial truth, and highly imaginative and suggestive. The large works in the Gallery do not convey the impression of space and magnitude better than these small gems of art. "A Wet and Stormy Morning, Trebarwith Sands, near Tintagel, Cornwall" (66), is absolutely ghastly in its sense of desolation, with the sickening evidences of the night's destruction strewn along the beach, and the leaky, angry gleam breaking through the torrents of the leaden, lurid clouds. A Sunset Effect upon the same sands is equally truthful. The coppery tones of the horizon melting into gold higher up in the sky, and contrasted with the purple shadows from the rocks, and the green surge of the sea, are inimitable effects.

Mr. F. Warren does not look on nature with the feverish intensity which was so observable in his works of last year, and which gave them, with much artistic feeling, the startling accuracy of photographs. Nevertheless, there is much of the faithful conscientious imitation which forms the better portion of Pre Raphaelitism in "Glen Sannox, Isle of Arran" (236). The sombre tones of this picture are very true to natural effect, and the heather and ferns scorched with autumnal hues are "picked out" with rare skill. The whole is rescued from being heavy by the vivid flash on the water, which serves as a focus to the picture. "Going a-Maying" (142), and "The Trysting-Tree" (110), are both charming; and, although "The Pedlar" (159) bears the name of Mr. Henry Warren (the President of the Society) we fancy we trace the hand of Mr. E. Warren in parts; but Mr. Warren may well be proud of his son.

Mr. T. L. Rowbotham contributes a large and noble view of the Lake of "Lago Maggiore" (162), with many of its picturesque accompaniments as seen on a calm hazy morning. The work is conspicuous for its masterly breadth and beauty, brightness and transparency, freshness and vigour. The other pictures of this artist are too numerous to particularise.

Mr. Bennet is another artist of established reputation, with perfect command over his medium, and quite au fait in all its resources. He is also very broad in touch and deep in tone—qualities which occasionally render his foliage heavy. The fine general effect and the force of colour in "Glen Nevis" (48) are, however, undeniable.

Mr. M'Kewan is still more bold in the application of his pigments, and all his various works are full of power.

Mr. Telbin has steeped the often-painted "Piazzetta, Venice" (191) in so beautiful a tone of colour and lit it with such an original effect of light that it comes upon us with all the charm and freshness of novelty.

Mr. Philp's picture, "The Stag Rocks, Lizard Point, Cornwall" (128), has a very promising and high order of excellence. The glistening white light sleeping on the keen edge of the ocean, continued tremulously to the sparkling sea-shore, and the dazzling effect of the whole circumambient atmosphere, we havn seldom seen equalled.

Artists generally arrive at a higher character of breadth of style by early attention to detail; but Mr. D'Egville reverses the rule, and is so happy in his efforts this year at greater finish that we do not desire progress in any other direction.

The light and water in particular are very successful in "Richmond Castle, Yorkshire" (189), by Mr. Whymper.

The merits of Mr. Fahey's pictures are well known to the public. As they are very numerous this year, we may therefore be excused from describing them in detail. And the same remarks we would make in respect to those prolific artists, Messrs. Howse and Chase.

Mr. Robins always proves himself an able seaman. We do not mean corporeally, but that his representations of perhaps the most difficult element to paint are always far above the average.

The pressure of other matter obliges us to conclude by simply remarking that there is great strength and character in a view in Rouen, by Mr. J. S. Prout; that Mr. Mitchell's works deserve examination; that Messrs. Weigal and Weir excel in animal-painting, and Mrs. Margetts and Miss Harris in still-life.

FINE ARTS.

TINTORETTO. PHOTOGRAPHS AFTER THE PAINTINGS IN THE SCUOLA DI SAN ROCIO, VENICE. Published by the Arundel Society.

THE great scarcity of pictures by Tintoretto, and the fact that very few good engravings from the best works of this painter were in existence, induced the Council of the Arundel Society to present their subscribers and the public with some transcripts of the finest works of this great painter in their most truthful form; but considerable impediments existed to the accomplishment of this desire. It was difficult to render the peculiar feeling and touch of Tintoretto by any known method of engraving. The bold and vigorous dash which seemed to spring into existence upon the canvas coincident with its creation in the painter's mind, the crumbling touch, and suggested idea, would have been totally lost in a lithographic drawing or a steel engraving. In the midst of these difficulties it occurred to the Council of the Society that if accurate copies were made from the original pictures, giving line for line and touch for touch, the most perfect facsimile might be obtained by the aid of photography. Numerous experiments were made, and at length the desired result was obtained. It was found that an intimate knowledge of the power and action of the lens was required, combined with a perfect knowledge of the photographic effect of various shades of colour.

It is well known to photographers that if a picture be photographed under ordinary circumstances, the high lights being perfect in their tone, the detail in shadow will be quite lost in obscurity; but, if the process be continued so as to bring out the detail in shadow, the lights become, as it is technically expressed, burnt up, and, instead of being white, are reduced to half tones. To obviate this difficulty it was necessary to introduce in the shadows of the paintings tints that possess considerable photographic power, and which are dark in effect to the eye. Mr. Edward Rainford was the artist selected by the Council for this purpose, and was dispatched to Venice armed with advice and instruction from Mr. Ruskin as to the great points that were particularly observed in regard to the paintings in question. Some of the peculiarities which have been accomplished by this novel process may be mentioned:—The muscles of the right leg of one of the thieves in the photograph of "Christ bearing the Cross" are each most dexterously indicated by Tintoretto with a bold and skilful sweep of the brush, beginning tenderly at its insertion, and with a firm intelligent hand bellying out into the developed mass of muscle, and then gradually subsiding until it is again lost. In the photograph this may be seen very successfully rendered—the very lines of the brush being there, an effect which it would be impossible to give by engraving. The figure holding the rope, half lost in shadow, and executed with a few rapid lines, would have its spirit lost in engraving, but here comes out with startling effect. In the figure of Pilate, in the other picture, there is a piece of drapery thrown about the legs: this was rapidly executed by Tintoretto, with a brush half full of very thin colour, giving a peculiar broken and crumbling effect, which is perfectly given in the photograph. These may seem minor points to mention, but they serve to illustrate the truthfulness of the method by which these great works of art are executed.

ENGRAVING.—THE CABINET OF LORD ABERDEEN. Drawn by GILBERT. Engraved by WALKER.

IN our recent notice of the "Peace Conferences at Paris," painted by M. Dubufe, senior, we had occasion to remark the great difficulty of composing the figures of living celebrities in juxtaposition in such a way as to make each unconstrained in attitude, and, at the same time, to attain in the general effect the beauty of unity. This problem has been rarely solved by draughtsmen of the British school, however much we may surpass our neighbours in colour and some other qualities. On this occasion, however, we must confess ourselves perfectly satisfied, and we are much mistaken if this print do not "sail down the stream of time," as much by its art-power as by the momentum it derives from its most admirable likenesses of a large majority of the ablest practical statesmen of the middle of the nineteenth century. The subject is, to begin with, striking, interesting, and memorable. The two leading figures are men who were no unprominent actors in the soul-stirring drama over which 1815 drew its vast curtain; and we see them in their green old age, and in the plenitude of their sagacity, their vast experience, and their moral energies, deep in debate on how the vessel of State was to meet a blast from an opposite quarter. The artist has managed to make Lord Aberdeen's head the "eye of the picture," and the eye of the spectator at once recognises it to be a most admirable likeness; in fact, except that it appears to us ever so slightly elongated, our imagination cannot conceive a more perfect likeness of mortal man. Lord Palmerston seems to be saying to Mr. Gladstone that in a war the true economy is to accumulate effort upon effort regardless of cost until a result be attained; and by a most refined touch of satire the artist has made Lord John the right-hand man of Lord Aberdeen and Lord Palmerston. The deep intellectual gaze of Lord Clarendon is most admirably given. It would appear that the members of the Cabinet sat to Mr. Walker, the engraver, so as to secure the utmost resemblance; and we are informed of a circumstance which completes the historical value of the print, that this is the first one that has appeared of an English Cabinet, with the Council-room and its furniture, correctly represented. This is not in itself important, except as showing the anxiety of Mr. Walker to attain rigid accuracy. The print is not yet ready, but we have said enough to show that the subject, the drawing, and the engraving, are of the first class.

PORTRAIT OF REAR-ADMIRAL SIR FRANCIS BEAUFORT, K.C.B., F.R.S.

A very beautiful Engraving has just been published by Messrs. Graves, of Pall mall, of Rear-Admiral Sir Francis Beaufort, K.C.B., the late Hydrographer of the Admiralty.

We learn, from O'Byrne's "Naval Biography," that this gallant officer, distinguished by his talents and deeds in peace and in war, entered the Navy in 1787; was present in Cornwallis's celebrated retreat, and assisted, in the course of the same year, in driving on shore and destroying L'Éveheué; in 1796 took part in the capture of La bonne Citoyenne; fought in a partial action, in 1798, with La Charente; was instrumental in capturing La Flore; and witnessed the taking, on various occasions, of nine privateers, and other armed vessels. In 1800 this gallant officer performed an exploit of great spirit and daring in boarding, with the barge and two cutters under his orders, and capturing, after an obstinate resistance, the Spanish ship San Josef, moored under the protection of the fortress of Puentgirola, and flanked by a French privateer. In this dashing exploit he received a wound on the head, and several slugs in his body and through his left arm.

In 1803 he devoted his time to the formation of a line of telegraphs from Dublin to Galway; and in 1805, commanding the Woolwich, he proceeded to the East Indies, and thence to the Rio de la Plata, of which he made an accurate survey during the campaign of 1807. After commanding various ships, he was actively engaged for two years in a survey of the coast of Karamania, in Asia Minor—an employment he was obliged to relinquish in consequence of a desperate and nearly fatal gunshot wound he received from the hand of a fanatical Turk. For several years after this Rear-Admiral Beaufort appears to have been occupied in laying down the results of his labours, and in constructing, under the orders of the Lords of the Admiralty, a variety of charts. In July, 1832, he was appointed Hydrographer of the Admiralty, and has successively received those honours he has so deservedly earned by his talents and unceasing labours.

The engraving is admirably executed by Mr. James Scott, from the life-size portrait painted by Mr. Stephen Pearce for Greenwich Hospital, at the desire of the subscribers to the Beaufort Testimonial

"AT THE FOUNTAIN."—PAINTED BY F. W. TOPHAM.

FROM THE EXHIBITION OF THE SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER-COLOURS.

MR. TOPHAM, unlike most of our artists, is adventurous in his choice of subject. He was first known, we believe, for his Irish pictures, and then he gave us Spanish scenes. This was no great change, how ever, for our readers are aware of the strong resemblance there is between the Southern Hibernians and the Northern Iberians, resulting from the considerable infusion of Spanish blood in the inhabitants of the south of Ireland; the principal difference being that piquant style of beauty seen among the daughters of Erin, in which, while the hair is black, a deep-blue eye flashes from under black eyebrows and eyelashes. Mr. Topham subsequently made a tour among the mountains of Wales, and this year he has wandered to Brittany. Our Engraving proves, however, that the artist cannot forget the dusky beauties of Andalusia—the electric flash of their fine eyes and those sun-kissed cheeks in which the blood suddenly flushes and fades like Ambient flame. The picture is, indeed, one of Mr. Topham's happiest efforts with a similar theme. The figures glow with real sultry Spanish blood, and the suppressed burning passion of the muleteer must make the neighbourhood of the agua fresca of the fountain doubly pleasant and refreshing. The draught of the cool, grateful element is, indeed, the greatest luxury in such a climate. Many English artists succeed in representing Spanish character, but they cannot quite forget the cold raw atmosphere they leave behind. Their Spaniards, therefore, look like other bilious people in a cold climate, or when they get wet through. Here the air is hot, the baked and blistered plaster peels from the wall, the dry and prickly African aloe springs wild from the parched soil, and beyond the river (the Guadalquivir or Guadiana, whichever it may be) the sierra is quite bare.

We have not overheard, like the artist, the "soft-nothings" the young muleteer is whispering into, evidently, a no-unwilling ear. Probably they would be silly enough to all but themselves, and we cannot say whether he speaks the purest Castilian; but to our mind his sentiments are, at least for the time, giving him the air of a gentleman. We no doubt he feels as chivalrous as the swaggering "Caballero" of old Romancero or Cancionero. We are sure also from his honest face that his words are direct from the heart, and modulated with that tremolo of emotion which turns the simplest language into the highest eloquence. But we have the authority of Simonde, in his "Littérature du Midi," that the erect and high-spirited peasantry of Spain still preserve much of the ancient proud feeling, and that the higher we go in society the greater we find the modern degeneracy. The rascally muleteers in "Gil Blas" we will not believe were at that period all fair specimens of their class. That maiden, also, in the picture, is unquestionably a true lady; for we are prepared to believe anything Mr. Topham tells us so prettily. Look how unconsciously she rests her hand on the water-jar (whether filled or not most likely she does not know), and how modestly her head is averted to hide the gathering blush, and how those long purple-black fringes are let fall to conceal the pleasure which she knows would, despite herself, twinkle in her eye. By-the-by, we are quite ignorant of what eyelashes are in these latitudes, and all the beauty and mystery which they might be addnced from their cast shadows. Some persons have even been found so insensible to their charms that a recent lady traveller represented that all Spanish women squinted! In all parts of the world we find that the darker the complexion the more natural taste luxuriates in decided colours till we get the black rejoicing in positive yellow, scarlet, and white. And in the picture this is observed, for the gentleman muleteer is decorated after the manner of the country, with a scarf barred with bright colours; and the lady water-bearer is still more gay in figured chintz and coquettish fupon and neckerchief—not to mention the pleasant contrast of her black hair with the pendent opaline ear-rings and the gracefully-attached damask rose.

THE MACKENZIE RIVER INDIANS AND THE HUDSON'S BAY COMPANY

(To the Editor of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.)

SIR, In the supplement to your Number of the 26th ult. you refer to a new work of Dr. Armstrong in proof of an oft-repeated calumny in his notice to the treatment of the Indians in the vicinity of the Mackenzie River by the Hudson's Bay Company.

Not having read the above work, I cannot gather from your editorial remarks the exact amount of proof afforded by the author of the fact that the Company have been in the habit of supplying the Indians with ardent spirits; but I should infer that, if the practice existed, more satisfactory authority might be adduced than the loose and unreliable testimony of Europeans and savages, whose evidence can scarcely be sufficient to establish against a company composed of high-minded English gentlemen a charge most unequivocally denied by them and their agents, and which proceeds simply from the invention of men whose disregard of truth engenders a suspicion that their pretended humanity towards the Indians is but the offspring of hostility to the Company.

The statement which seems to have afforded comfort in certain quarters is entirely at variance with the truth, and I am happy to be able to refute it.

From 1834 to 1849 I was intrusted with the superintendence of all the Company's stations on and in the vicinity of the Mackenzie, and I affirm that during all that period no rum or other intoxicating liquors were supplied to the Indians at any of the Company's posts; no spirits of any description were imported into the territory, except what were required for the use of the officers of the Company; and no part of this supply ever found its way to the Indians.

I therefore deny, in the most unqualified manner, the fact referred to and, in so doing, am actuated by no other motive than a regard for truth and justice; and I trust that, moved by the same high principle, you will not refuse a place to this refutation in your interesting and popular Journal.

KENNICOTT MCPHERSON.

Formerly Chief Factor of the Hudson's Bay Company, and now of Norway House, Picton, in the province of Nova Scotia.

AN INTREPID AND HARDY EXPRESS-MAN.—From the New York Herald we extract the following account of Mr. Thompson, the Carson Valley Express-Man:—"Mr. Thompson has crossed the Sierra Nevada thirty-one times during the winter months, generally on snow shoes; this trip, however, they were not necessary, the crust of the snow being strong enough to sustain him in his ordinary shoes. He never carries a blanket or other covering save a common suit of winter clothing. When night overtakes him, he kindles a fire by some dry stump or tree top, and lies down by its side. These extraordinary exposures never produce colds, but as soon as he reaches the settlements, and after breathing the confined atmosphere of light rooms, he at once becomes subject to these annoyances. The greatest difficulty he experiences in his travels is from the sun's reflection from the crystalised snows of the untimbered mountain summits. So intense is this light that it sometimes causes total blindness, and crisps and parches the skin of the face, like the heat from a furnace

"GIPSIES—TWILIGHT"—PAINTED BY G. DODGSON.—FROM THE EXHIBITION OF THE SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER-COLOURS.

We know of no artist better qualified to realise the twilight effect of this picture than Mr. Dodgson. About his gayest and most sunny scenes there is not only an absence of all hardness and edginess seldom seen in water-colour drawings, but the representation is of that unlaboured, intangible, we might almost say dreamily, poetical character, that while it exactly suits the far niente of the figures, which are generally engaged with nothing requiring a greater display of energy than Watteau would have given them in precisely best adapted to give, with lowered tone, the solemn stillness and hush of ate evening, and the almost quivering indistinctness of objects, when

Twilight grey
Has in her sober livery all things clad.

And you see them, moreover, through the evening exhalations and the dewy mists of approaching night. And yet the first sight of another picture by Mr. Dodgson, hanging immediately above this on the screen where it is exhibited, which represents the playful chequer of sunlight, after struggling through trees, would scarcely lead us to imagine that there could be much in common between them. But it is thus very tremulousness, which is perceptible more or less in all Mr. Dodgson's pictures, that is best adapted to represent the peculiar effect before us. We know what we are looking at is perfectly true to some of our impressions of nature, and yet the eye is unable to separate detail, or assign form. This quality is nearly the same as that which rendered the drawing of David Cox, some few years since, so extremely fascinating to the eye and the imagination. The old ruin is introduced with nice feeling; and the contrast of the gipsy group, with the suggestion it gives of some projected predatory expedition during the peaceful hours, might tempt our pens also astray, and rob our readers of some of the quiet pleasure of their own fancies which might be awakened by the spell of such an hour and such a picture.

"WINTER—SHEEP FEEDING."—PAINTED BY E. DUNCAN.

FROM THE EXHIBITION OF THE SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER-COLOURS.

SIMPLICITY and completeness are the characteristics of Mr. Duncan's water-colour drawings. The evidence of these qualities lies in the fact that the artist is never obtrusive, and therefore his art is perfect, according to the old adage, because it is concealed. True, in the picture from which we have taken the Engraving before us, not only are the figures quietly and appropriately engaged, and the whole obviously so technically correct that it would satisfy a sheep-farmer; and the truthful painting of the sheep, perhaps, enables a shepherd to exercise his singular faculty of recognising each again separately; but (which is much rarer among artists than mere accuracy, and greatly increases the value of the work) the whole aspect and effect is perfectly remembered—for necessarily the picture must have been painted almost entirely from recollection. The snow looks like snow, and not like a blanket or skimmed milk; and the atmosphere is full of that raw mist exhaled before the sun's directer rays from the partly thawed snow; and now that the sidelong glance of the wandering, prodigal god of day is but dim, feeble, and bloodshot, the mist is turning into frosty wreaths which we know will ere morning bedeck with beautiful silvery rime every flake or paling, and every other object not already covered with the snow. The only thing which appears at first sight in the picture itself not quite true to natural effect is the positive colour of the sheep; but a moment's reflection will convince the spectator that this is peculiarly true, contrasted as they are with the snow, and catching the slant highly-coloured rays of the sun on their fleeces through the dense wintry atmosphere. Then what a descriptive little incident is that of the crows, emboldened by hunger, seeking food close to their human enemies, in the contracted fold in which the flock is penned and screened from the wintry wind!

We have always observed that the painting of sheep is Mr. Duncan's specialty. It is comparatively easy to group sheep tastefully when they are feeding, as here, artificially; but it is not so easy to compose them agreeably, and give variety and an appearance of accident to their arrangement and position, when they are quite naturally engaged—at least when feeding. Gilpin, in his "Western Tour," says:—"A feeding flock is seldom well grouped; they commonly separate; or, as the poet well expresses it, 'they are scattered by degrees and whiten all the land.' Nor are their attitudes varied, as they all usually move the same way, 'progressive, like a stream.'" We cannot refrain from adding the following pleasant passage from this delightful author on the same subject: "To see a flock of sheep in their most picturesque form we should see them reposing after their meal is over; and if they are in sunshine they are still the more beautiful. In reposing they are generally better grouped, and their forms are more varied. Some are commonly standing, and others lying on the ground, with their little ruminating heads in various forms. And if the light be strong it spreads over the whole one general mass; and is contrasted at the same time by a shadow equally strong which the flock throws on the ground. It may be observed also that the fleece itself is well disposed to receive a beautiful effect of light. It does not, indeed, like the smooth covering of hair, allow the eye to trace the muscular form of the animal. But it has a beauty of a different kind: the flakiness of the wool catches the light, and breaking it into many parts, yet without destroying the mass, gives it a peculiar richness." We must do Mr. Duncan the justice to say, that we never saw his sheep ill-arranged in all the various situations in which he has represented them.

THE TURNER COLLECTION AT MARLBOROUGH HOUSE.

THE full magnitude of Turner's bequest to his country may now be appreciated, in some degree commensurately with its importance, on the walls of Marlborough House all unworthy as they are for the adequate display of their priceless decoration. With two or three exceptions, the whole of Turner's oil-pictures have been carefully cleansed from the impurities they contracted through long neglect in the house in Queen Anne-street. They have been judiciously arranged in approximate chronological sequence, and hung as advantageously as the inappropriate nature of the rooms in which they are placed will admit, under the commendably painstaking and judicious direction of Mr. Wornum, assisted by Sir Charles Eastlake. The passport to immortality of the barber's son of Maiden-lane is now signed, sealed, and delivered. Upon the path trod so humbly, patiently, and perseveringly, by that most retiring and essentially unworldly man, we would find "sic itur ad astra" should have been inscribed. Those who have been the slowest to join in mere fashionable idol-worship, or to suffer themselves to be blinded by the glare of critical light to Turner's weaknesses and extravagances, must, nevertheless, in these rooms bow reverently to the incomparable vastness and variety of his genius. Those also who have lived contemporaneously with Turner, and only seen two or three works exhibited from year to year, will find that they have been entirely unable to form the estimate of the great painter which this collection will surprise them into making, and which posterity will unquestionably ratify. The productions of a mediocre man, however accumulated, make but a commonplace totality. Here all are parts of one stupendous whole; all, even the least important, serve to illustrate some particular phase of a most gigantic mind, which reflected the beautiful in nature in a myriad different forms, often adding its own prismatic light. These pictures compose a complete gallery of landscape art in themselves. And, besides the great number of works which are eminently original, we may safely assert that there is no strongly-marked development of style, in any way lying within his province of art, which Turner has not successfully rivalled, without servilely copying, or even imitating, but essentially and vitally reproduced. Thus we have examples successively of Wilson, Claude, the two Poussins, Salvator Rosa, the Vandevelde, Backhuysen, Cuyp, and the other Dutch and Flemish marine and landscape painters. His all-embracing sympathies, if not his self-relying ambition, sometimes, however, led him astray, as may be seen in a few almost ludicrous imitations of Wilkie and Reynolds, and in an early portrait of himself; for it must be confessed, once and for all, that although Turner's figures, when subsidiary to landscape, are occasionally highly effective, he failed entirely in painting the figure per se, or the "human face divine." We must not, however, allow ourselves to be seduced into attempting to indicate merely the diverse characteristics of Turner's mind or practice. Even the whole of our columns would not afford space to sketch them. One fact, however, is very apparent, after an examination of his works—namely, that although the finest imagination is evident in many of his earliest performances, and although his latest pictures, with their unrestrained daring and aspiration to effect the impossible—even to the representation of light itself—together show the fire that burned within (all the more intensely from its solitary habits), still he must have considered himself a student, not simply of Nature, but of the works of other masters, long beyond the period which ordinary painters think such condescension necessary. Between twenty and thirty years did he labour humbly and in an imitative spirit before he produced those glorious artistic emanations in which the subjective element—the painter's own imagination—is perhaps most conspicuous in subject, in colour, and in composition. A distinction, likewise, may broadly be drawn in respect to his colouring at the period when imagination commonly predominated. Up to this time his works are beautiful rather in gradation and contrast of tint and tone than in purity and variety of colour and hue. Beyond a certain point of imitation, however, his impetuous temperament would not permit him to go, and in an early stage of his career he appears to have given up the study of the figure. But, if his temperament were not the cause of his doing so it is questionable whether greater attention in this particular would have been compatible with other qualities, or at least whether it is possible for them to coexist equally in any human mind.

When we mention that there are some sixty-faced pictures added to the already hung, bringing the number altogether to more than one hundred, and that those now placed are generally as elaborate in character as the first instalments, it will be readily understood that, with the space at our command, we can no more attempt a description of the pictures individually than we can analyse their general characteristics. They fill the entire and numerous suite of rooms on the first floor lately occupied by the Bernal and Soulages Collections, and include works bearing dates as distant as 1798 and as recent at 1850. On a future occasion we may give a detailed description and critical notice; but at present we must limit ourselves to a bare enumeration of the principal works in something of the order of their importance. Before doing so, however, we will permit ourselves the observation, in all candour, viz., that much as we differ from Mr. Ruskin in some essentials, and in numberless particulars, it is but simple justice to acknowledge that the study of Turner was a theme worthy of all his enthusiasm and eloquence; and we would recommend our readers to adopt in the study of the painter's works at least the classification of them which Mr. Ruskin has made.

All Turner's pictures are interesting, and some that are unfinished are highly instructive. The following are chiefly completed works (a few, as for instance the first two pictures, are well known by engravings)—viz., "Crossing the Brook" (497), "Dido and Æneas leaving Carthage on the Morning of the Chase" (494), "Apulela in Search of Apuleius" (486), in all three of which Claude is surpassed; "The Field of Waterloo" (500), engraved; "The Death of Nelson" (480); "The Tenth Plague of Egypt" (470), in which we have the Poussins and Salvator Rosa united; "Spithead—Boat's Crew Recovering an Anchor" (481), "The Destruction of Sodom" (474), "Caligula's Palace and Bridge—Bay of Baiæ" (512); "Snowstorm, with Hannibal and his Army Crossing the Alps" (460); "The Deluge" (493), "Apollo Killing the Python" (488); "A Frosty Morning—Sunrise" (492), equal to Cuyp's representations of similar effects; "Rome from the Vatican—Raphael and the Fornarina in the Corridor of the Loggie" (503), "Carthage—Dido Directing the Equipment of the Fleet" (506), "The Loretto Necklace" (509), "The Parting of Hero and Leander" (521), "The Opening of the Whitehalls" (533), and "Fire at Sea" (558), a very grand unfinished work.

We may add that, in addition to the care Mr. Wornum has shown in superintending the preparation and arrangement of the pictures, he has compiled a trustworthy and excellent catalogue of the whole of the British school, which is authorised, and sold at a very moderate price.

LITERATURE.

CEYLON: PAST AND PRESENT. By SIR GEORGE BARROW, Bart. Murray.

In a small compass this volume contains a varied account of interesting and instructive information, both of ancient and modern date, relating to the most beautiful island in the Indian Ocean. When it belonged to the Portuguese it was described to the King of Portugal by one of his officers "as an island whose surrounding seas are sown with pearls, whose woods are cinnamon, its mountains covered with rubies, its caverns full of crystal: in a word, the place which God chose for the terrestrial paradise." The traditions of the country record the popular belief that the Garden of Eden was placed in Ceylon; on Adam's Peak is the impress of the foot of our common parent, and Adam's Bridge perpetuates the memory of the spot from which he quitted Paradise, and passed over to the continent of India. This island was known to the Romans by the name of Taprobane, under which designation it is mentioned by Ovid; it was visited by an Embassy appointed by the Emperor Claudius; and a coin of Tiberius Cæsar, very well preserved, was dug out of the soil with many others only a few years since. The Portuguese formed establishments at Ceylon in 1506, but were driven out in 1656 by the Dutch on the invitation of the King of Kandy, who soon discovered that his new allies were as dangerous to him as the enemies they had expelled. At the Peace of Amiens the whole country was formally ceded to England, under whose sway it has ever since remained.

The opening chapters of this work contain an abridged account of the book of Robert Knox, who was detained in Ceylon during nearly twenty years, from 1659 to 1679, when he made his escape. He wrote an account of his detention in the island, with many curious remarks on its antiquities, agriculture, climate, and natural history; which was republished in 1817 by the Rev. W. Bisset, of Oxford, who assumed the editorial name of Philalethes. Knox was an accurate observer, and the truthfulness of his narrative is now established. Sir George Barrow has industriously compiled much valuable information from the volumes of more recent travellers, and from the official reports of the British Governors of the colony; and these, coupled with his own judicious comments, form a pleasant and instructive work.

In the time of Knox the country was well cultivated, and the rivers were skilfully utilised for the purposes of irrigation. There were several tanks, canals, and artificial lakes, and the ruins of ancient cities. One of these last is thus noticed by Sir William Colebrook:—

> The ruined city of Anuradapoora, where I passed two days, was built, according to the Singhalese annals, about 2300 years ago. Ptolemy mentions it by name, as I learn from Vincent, and it is at the same time a most curious monument of the former opulence and civilisation of this island. I saw here ornamented capitals and balustrades, and bas-reliefs of animals and foliage, that have nothing of the rudeness and grotesque forms conspicuous in the Singhalese architecture. I can not better express my opinion of their elegance than by saying that, had I seen them in a museum, I should, without hesitation, have pronounced them to be Grecian, or of Grecian descent. The semicircular stone slab, at the foot of a staircase, is carved in a pattern of foliage which I have repeatedly seen in works of Grecian and Roman origin. The flourishing state of art proves wealth and taste; and there are enormous conical buildings of brick, called Dagobas, whose Egyptian dimensions and durability show that they must have been built by a very numerous and laborious race. The immense tanks, of which I saw the ruins, and by which the country was irrigated, were the cause of its permanent fertility as long as they were kept in repair.

This city of Anuradapoora, on account of its stupendous ruins, has been styled the Palmyra of Ceylon. The piety of the people induced them to build temples worthy of the Gods; and one, called Lowa-maha-paaya, still exhibits 160 stone pillars, forming nearly a square of 40 on each side. They are eleven feet high, and ancient writings attest that these pillars originally formed the basement of a structure which rose to the height of nine stories. The hydraulic works were of corresponding magnitude; that of the Lake of Kandelly was nine miles in circumference. The bunds or embankments to secure the water were formed of hewn stones, "piled up twenty feet high, and from 150 to 200 feet thick at the base, and a mile and one-third long." A stone dyke was constructed across the Arippo river, to divert the current into a huge reservoir; and these colossal works are referred to a period three centuries prior to the Christian era. Tradition gives the honour of construction to giants forty feet in stature, which, Sir George Barrow happily remarks, "is an amusing form in which a confession of inferiority is couched."

It is stated, on very good authority, that many of these tanks, if not all, are capable of repair; and if so, it is the duty of our Government to execute so useful a work for the benefit of the inhabitants, who have not the means of accomplishing so important an undertaking. To neglect it is to condemn the soil to barrenness. Sir Henry Ward, the present Governor, who pronounces the tanks perfect in all their essential parts, makes this observation, pregnant with reflections to statesmen:—"For five consecutive days I rode through the most lovely country in the world; but in that country one thing was wanting—man." However, he declares that the natives are capable of steady and persevering exertions when they are aided and directed, but they cannot be expected to settle down in districts where the facilities of irrigation are not afforded.

In describing the natural history of the country, KNOX gives a curious account of the talipot-tree:—

> It is as big and tall as a ship's mast, and very straight, bearing only boughs, which are of great use and benefit to this people, one single leaf being so broad and large that it will cover fifteen or twenty men, and is tough and most wonderful made for men's convenience to carry along with them; for though this leaf be thus broad when it is open, yet it will fold close like a lady's fan, and then it is no bigger than a man's arm; it is wonderfully light; they cut them to pieces and carry them in their hands. He whole leaf spread is round, almost like a circle, but upon their heads as they travel, with the pecked end foremost, which is convenient to make their way through the boughs and thickets. When the sun is vehemently hot they use them to shade themselves from the heat. Soldiers all carry them; for, besides the benefit of keeping them dry in case it rain upon the march, these leaves make their tents to lie under in the night—a marvellous mercy which Almighty God hath bestowed upon this poor and naked people in this rainy country.

Knox also speaks of the cocoanut-tree a foot in diameter, rising to a height of from forty to sixty feet; and of the kettule, which yields a pleasant liquor, but not stronger than water. When boiled it resembles sugar in taste, and might be made, Sir G. Barrow thinks, as good as French beet-root sugar. Medicinal herbs grow wild in the woods, which Knox describes as their "apothecaries' shops." Ants are abundant, and their bite is as hot as "coal of fire." The natives catch and cook the honey-bee, which is deemed a luxury of the table; but the favourite fruit is the grub. The bodies of spiders are as big as a man's fist. There are no lions in the country, but elephants are numerous; and Mr. Sirr, in his work on Ceylon, says that "during the native dynasty it was the practice to train elephants to put criminals to death by trampling upon them—the creatures being taught to prolong the agony of the wretched sufferers by crushing the limbs, avoiding the vital parts."

In a commercial point of view alone Ceylon is a valuable appendage to the United Kingdom; and, were its capabilities fully developed, it would form a large market for the consumption of British manufactures. It has at this time 98 cinnamon estates, 356 for the culture of coffee, and 148 cocoanut plantations. It produces rice; and, while the value of the tobacco crop in 1838 only realised £2800, it had risen in 1854 to £55,000. There are nineteen sugar estates; and salt is largely exported to the East Indies. When the Dutch possessed the pearl-fishery at Cape Comorin and the Gulf of Mansar, six or seven hundred boats used to be engaged in it; and, from recent surveys of the banks, it is expected that they have now recovered, or by 1859 will recover, their productive powers. In 1855 the banks of Colombo yielded pearls to the value of £10,922; the expenses being £2632.

The revenue of Ceylon for the year 1855 amounted to £476,273; the expenditure to £468,659; giving an excess of revenue over expenditure of £70,664, and to this sum may be added £30,000 (making together £100,000) from the savings of preceding years, after paying off Treasury Notes to the extent of £87,500, and all other liabilities of the local Government. The value of imports into the island for 1854 according to their declared value, amounted to £2,597,345, but of this sum £1,37[illegible] was specie and bullion from India, of which £882,807 was re-exported. The value of exports of Ceylon produce amounted to £1,236,938; to which may be added £325,542 for imports re-exported, and £682,807 specie re-exported making together £2,245,288.

The following is the account of the shipping:—

> The number of vessels inwards at the several ports of the island, in 1854 was 2019; and their tonnage 325,665: the number outwards was 2016; tonnage, 326,310. The number of square rigged vessels belonging to the colony is 55; tonnage, 3219: number of dhonies, 432; tonnage, 19,399.

The population in round numbers may be put down at 800,000, o which only about 5500 are white, exclusive of the military. All the rest are coloured. There were 112 Government schools, with 4836 pupils on the list, maintained at a cost of £8036, in 1856, and this has been somewhat increased. The number of schools of all descriptions is 1577. Some thousand copies of the Gospel, in the Singhalese language, have been printed at the expense of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge in England, and circulated among the natives, who are divided between the worship of Buddha and Brahma.

The extreme length of the island of Ceylon is about 270 miles, and the extreme breadth about 145; but the average breadth does not exceed 100 miles. In shape it nearly resembles a ham. The mariner scents the land from the sea, and Lord Valentia affirms that the fragrant odour was perceptible at a distance of nine leagues. Kandy was the ancient, Colombo is the modern, capital. The scenery in the interior is beautiful and grand. The loftiest mountain, called Adam's Peak, is 7379 feet above the level of the sea.

FROM BOMBAY TO BUSHIRE AND BUSSORA. By WILLIAM ASHTON SHEPHERD. Bentley.

The author of this volume has twice visited the Persian Gulf. He kept a journal of his travels, and the book he has given to the public is founded on personal observation. It contains some notes on the Persian coast, with remarks on the policy of Russia. Mr. Shepherd had an interview with the late Imaum of Muscat and his family. He describes the Prince as of a benign and fatherly aspect, and observes that in expression of countenance "there is so much of firmness, decision of purpose, kind feeling, and decision of character, combined with his general welcome and warm grasp, that your esteem is won at once." He also speaks in high terms of the interpreter, Mahmood Ben Comise, who was educated at Highgate, at the expense of the Imaum. Mahmood is a good linguist, and well informed on various topics. A African origin, being a native of Zanzebar. His library was well stored with works on history, biography, and science, in the English and French languages; and his active mind is far superior to the Asiatic level. The following is a sketch of the Bay of Muscat:—

> A rocky basin, a third of whose circle is formed on the seaboard by a lowering, dark, volcanic-looking land, some six hundred feet high, rough and rugged as rock alone can be separated from its bigger and rougher brother, the mainland, by a narrow chink, through which rolls coral-rock-hidden, and scarcely perceptible ones on each side of the harbour mouth; in front, behind, on the right, on the left, above, and on a level with us, are forts; but how built, you shall presently hear.
> They are so built that huge masses of the materials tumble down whenever the heavy metal is discharged. The island of Khismis is the nearest and healthiest in the Persian Gulf. It was once famed for its vines, but is now barren, though many parts of it might be rendered productive if Arab sloth could be stimulated to industry. The town of Lingar, on the Persian main, is about fifteen miles from Bassador, and generally contains from 5000 to 6000 of the Shah's irregular troops. It is square, and walled in, each corner being protected by a tower. Bahren, on the Arabian coast, is celebrated for its pearl fishery. The island is thirty miles long, and but little elevated. It is a curious fact, mentioned by Mr. Shepherd, that fresh-water springs exist beneath the surface, often met with by the pearl-divers; and he was told "that the cruisers stationed here when in want of water procure it by sending down a man with a gun-barrel, which he fills and brings up." As to the value of the pearls and the fishery there is some interesting information, for which we must refer our readers to the volume. As we now have military occupation of Bushire, it may be well to extract a description of the town:—
> It contains between 700 and 800 houses, built of white, soft sandstone, encrusted with shells. The streets, formed by the inhospitable, windowless walls of the two storied-houses, are not more than six or seven feet wide, and are everywhere infested with many dogs, and choked with filth and sand, the former thrown down from the houses, the latter derived from the crumbling sandstone of the walls, which add, under the influence of wind and rain, their liberal contributions to the sandy groundwork of the streets. The principal of these houses, those occupied by the wealthy, have wind-chimneys rising from 80 to a 100 feet in height, constructed so as to catch every breeze, and send a current of cold air into the apartment below. Besides these houses there are from 1000 to 1200 "cajan" huts. The cajan huts are built of the date palm leaf, and are occupied by the lower classes and soldiers. The town is about two miles in circumference protected as I have shown, on the land side, by a wall and various towers, and is wholly dependent for its supply of fresh water on a well about three miles distant.

Bushire is the only important sea-port in the Persian Gulf, and is the centre of the maritime commerce carried on between England, British India, and Persia. At Bussora Mr. Shepherd had the good fortune to come into personal communication with Mr. J. Taylor, British Vice-Consul, and agent to the East India Company, whose opinions on the resources of the country we have condensed. He considers the land between the Euphrates and Tigris as very fruitful. For hundreds of miles on the banks of both rivers the soil is alluvial, but, for want of enterprise, it is unproductive; though, with proper culture, it would yield abundant crops of rice, cotton, hemp, flax, and a variety of vegetables. The people are content to live on dates rather than submit to regular labour, and they hate their rulers, for the strongest antipathy exists between the Turk and the Arab. Mr. Taylor proposes to restore these once-flourishing countries by English skill and energy; and, among other expedients, he recommends the substitution of a small fleet of steam-boats for the flat-bottomed boats now in use. He says that immense quantities of corn are now destroyed annually, to enhance the cost of what is preserved, and that the wool is allowed to fall off the backs of the sheep.

Bussora, as its name imports, is built on a thick stony soil. It is inhabited by about 60,000 souls a mixed population of Armenians, Jews, Turks, Arabs, and Persians. The land extending between Bussora and the sea—a distance of sixty-five miles—is held by the Arabs to be one of the most delightful spots in Asia, and one of the most beautiful gardens in the world. The city, unfortunately for its inhabitants for commerce, has often changed masters, and been alternately exposed to the irruptions of the Turks, the Arabs, and the Persians.

It is situated about midway between the island of Karak (ancient Oriental traditions place the Garden of Eden) and the Persian Gulf; or that part of it anciently called the Bay of Basrah. It stands on the west bank of that noble stream, the Shat-al-Arab, which is navigable for ships of large burden, and is surrounded by a high clay wall, said to be six miles in circumference, and mounting many cannon.

The style of this book is light and sketchy, interspersed with amusing incidents and gossiping anecdotes; and, though it does not pretend to historic gravity, on current events and collateral subjects it is an instructive performance

THE LIFE AND TIMES OF SIR PETER CAREW, KT. (from the original Manuscript); with an Historical Introduction and Elucidatory Notes. By JOHN MACLEAN, Esq., F.S.A., &c. 8vo. Bell and Daldy.

This is one of those biographical sketches by contemporaries and friends of the men whose lives are recorded in them which stand next in interest to autobiographies. Sir Peter Carew was a remarkable man, belonging to a distinguished family in Devonshire, who, born in 1514, had an active part, after a turbulent youth, in the Continental wars. He was at the Battle of Pavia when young; afterwards became a favourite of Henry VIII., and lived through a part of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, when he distinguished himself in Ireland His life was written by John Vowell, alias Hooker, of Exeter, in the just ten years younger than himself, who was a great antiquary in his time, and was the uncle of the celebrated divine, Richard Hooker, the author of the "Ecclesiastical Polity."

The memoir of Sir Peter Carew, besides its historical importance, affords us a very curious picture of the manners and condition of the time. The author gives a very striking and very amusing description of the scenes of turbulence in which he was engaged even from childhood, and of his, in some cases, narrow escapes. Here, for instance, is a schoolboy anecdote of the days of bluff King Harry:—

This Peter, in his primer days, being very pert and forward, his father conceived a great hope of some good thing to come of him. And, having then other sons, he thought best to employ this his youngest so in the schools, and so, by means of learning, to bring him to some advancement; wherefore he brought him, being about the age of twelve years, to Exeter, to school, and lodged him with one Thomas Hunt, a draper and alderman of that city, and did put him to school to one Freers, then master of the Grammar School there; and whether it were that he was in fear of the said Freers, for he was counted to be a very hard and cruel master, or whether it were for that he had no affection to his learning, true it is he would never keep his school, but was a daily truant, and always ranging; whereof the schoolmaster misliking did oftentimes complain unto the foresaid Thomas Hunt, his host: upon which complaint, so made, the said Thomas would go, and send, abroad to seek out the said Peter. And, among many times thus seeking him, it happened that he found him about the walls of the said city, and, he running to take him, the boy climed up upon the top of one of the highest garrets of a turret of the said wall, and would not, for any request, come down, saying moreover to his host that, if he did press too fast upon him, he would surely cast himself down headlong over the wall: and then, said he, "I shall break my neck, and thou shalt be hanged, because thou makest me to leap down." His host, being afraid of the boy, departed, and left some to watch him, and so to take him, as soon as he came down. But forthwith he sent to Sir William Carew, and did advertise him of this, and of sundry other shrewd parts of his son Peter, who, at his next coming to take him to school, called his son before him, tied him in a line, and delivered him to one of his servants to be carried about the town, as one of his hounds, and they led him home to Mohun's ottery, like a dog. And after, when he shall be come to Mohun's ottery, he coupled him to one of his hounds, and so continued him for a time.

In the volume before us Vowell alias Hooker's "Life of Sir Peter Carew" is extremely well edited from the original manuscript by Mr. Maclean, with an abundance of historical illustration. Besides a mass of valuable notes to the text of the biography, Mr. Maclean has prefaced it by a very clear and well-written sketch of the history of the eventful period during which Carew lived, and he has added at the end of the volume a number of equally valuable historical documents not before printed. Altogether the volume is a treasure of historical matter relating to the sixteenth century, and ought to find a prominent place in every historical library.

JOHN CASSELL'S ART-TREASURES EXHIBITION. Part I. Kent and Co.

By the opening of the Art-Treasures Exhibition at Manchester there is presented to the public eye, under one roof, the most magnificent collection of works of art which was ever brought together in this or in any other country. The object of the publication, the first part of which is now before us, is to furnish a permanent memorial of this splendid event, and in such form as to excite among all classes of society a taste for fine art, and to give a just appreciation of what is beautiful. Here, in a form cheap beyond all precedent, high and low, rich and poor, are presented with highly-finished engravings from the chefs-d'œuvre of the great masters, placed for a season in this unique Exhibition. Beginning with the English School, this first part, containing five weekly numbers, giving engravings from the most celebrated of Sir David Wilkie's pictures, including the "Village Festival," "Blindman's Buff," "The Rent Day," "The Pedlar," "The Rabbit on the Wall," "The Blind Fiddler," "Sir Walter Scott and Family," "The Gentle Shepherd," "The Cut Finger," and several others. These are beautiful; but perhaps the gems of the present part are the highly-finished engravings from those popular masterpieces of Sir Edwin Landseer, "Dignity and Impudence," "The Two Dogs," "Laying Down the Law," "High Life" and "Low Life," and "The Stag in the Torrent." The literary portion of the work consists of a concise but graphic account of the construction and contents of the Art-Treasures Exhibition, and brief biographical notices of the artists and their productions. The object of the proprietor is so praiseworthy, the subjects are so well chosen, and the engravings so carefully executed, that the public can scarcely fail to testify their approval of the enterprise by that extensive patronage which can alone reimburse the proprietor for his great outlay.

THE LADIES' TREASURY. No. 3. Ward and Lock.

The third number of this popular periodical will greatly enhance its well-merited reputation. The numerous illustrations are fine specimens of engraving on wood; at the same time that they are peculiarly adapted to the taste of the wives, mothers, and daughters of England. The continuous tales, "Lucy Blair, or the Belle of the Season," edited by the authoress of "Cousin Geoffrey;" and of "The Old Bachelor," translated from the German by Mary Howitt, will raise still higher the literary standard of the periodical. The Art-Treasures Exhibition, Manchester, is represented by an engraving from a painting by Tidemann; and as the object of the proprietors of this cheap and useful publication is to instruct as well as amuse, a series of lessons in French is carried on upon a plan which will render self-instruction an easy task. The number for June contains, moreover, much useful information on the subjects of the manufacture of silk, fancy-work, cookery, and pure water. The "Chronicle of the Month" is a lively and graphic resumé of those events which are most likely to interest ladies.

MEMORIAL WINDOWS.—A beautiful stained-glass window has just been completed and placed in the basement of the tower of Montrose Church, at the expense of Mr. Joshua Reddish. The window has been constructed by Messrs Edmondson, of Manchester, and is divided into three compartments, the whole representing help to the hungry, thirsty, and the stranger (Matthew xxv. 35). The following inscription is along the bottom:—"Erected to the glory of God, in affectionate memory of John and Arminell Reddish, by Joshua, their son A.D. 1857."——A very beautiful memorial window has just been placed over the communion table in the church of St. Botolph, Aldgate, by the desire of Mr. Standring, an old and much-respected inhabitant of this parish, in affectionate remembrance of his late wife. Mr. Standring was not permitted to see the completion of this work, having died in February last; but his wishes in this respect have been most carefully carried out by his executors. The subject of the window is from Rubens's picture of "The Descent from the Cross," and has been executed by Clutterbuck, of Stratford, upon whom it reflects the highest credit.

THE MANCHESTER EXHIBITION.

(From our own Correspondent.)

THE numbers visiting the Art-Treasures Palace show a marked advance upon those of the first shilling day, having reached an average of upwards of 9000 daily, and with every prospect of increasing. Several large manufacturers in the first shilling week sent in their hands in a body, paying all expense—a liberal example, which has been followed to a considerable extent during the holidays. The large glass cases in the grand Central Hall, containing gems of virtù in gold, silver, porcelain, and other precious fabrics, the property of her Majesty, the Dukes of Portland and Devonshire, and other distinguished collectors, come in for their full share of attention (only imagine a cup and saucer of Sèvres china, belonging to the Duke of Portland, which cost 300 guineas!). So, also, do the long line of historical portraits which cover the two walls of the compartment; and the basket-work war-horses proudly prancing in ancient armour: and Mr. Hallé's band, which plays, by the way, a very miscellaneous selection of music, and not of the very best class; but still the chief attraction, we are glad to observe, is in the Galleries of Art-proper, ancient and modern, and if we were to count the numbers in each we should find them, we think, pretty evenly balanced. One very serious obstruction to the true enjoyment of these collections is in the incompleteness and too frequent inaccuracy of the Catalogue, and the confused order, or rather disorder, in the numbering of the pictures; but these grounds of complaint will to some extent now speedily be removed. The pictures are going through an entire new course of numbering, in blue upon a white ground, instead of in gold as heretofore, and a new, complete, and accurate Catalogue is promised us in a few days. With these preliminary remarks, we now proceed with our general survey of the works of the old masters in the South Gallery.

Masaccio, the pupil of Lorenzo Ghiberti, the sculptor of the immortal gates of the Baptistry of St. John at Florence, singled himself out above all the workers of his age by his masterly conceptions, the boldness of his outline and foreshortening, and the roundness of his figures, no less than for the remarkable realness of his treatment of flesh. All these admirable qualifications, or the most important of them, are illustrated in the almost speaking portrait of himself, the property of Lord Northwick, which, although very unfavourably hung, quite up in the corner, proudly asserts its claims to consideration, upon intellectual as well as artistic grounds, from the most ensual observer who hurries past. The simple dégagé attire, and the modest but solid and boldly-handled colouring, are evidence of how much may be done with the most simple materials in the hands of true genius.

Near at hand that other great Florentine, but of a different class, Angelico da Fiesole, arrests our attention with his "Last Judgment"—an extraordinary work (the property of Lord Ward), which was followed in many particulars by Michael Angelo in his great performance on the same subject. The figures of Christ and of the Virgin in the upper part of the picture are full of heavenly dignity; the hosts of angels, and of the blessed risen to life, on the right hand of the Saviour, present many charming episodes; but the other side of the picture, where the wicked are undergoing all the torments which the painter's imagination could suggest as most terrible, shows that he was less happy, less at home in themes of satanic malignity, than in those of seraphic love and devotion. Some of the figures, however, are marvellous for their energy and the correct study developed in them, which is the more singular, as this modest painter-monk had not participated to any extent in the new movement in design, which emphatically marked the progress of the revival. By Angelico, also, we observe a very beautifully-finished piece, "The Madonna Enthroned, with the Infant Christ," the property of Lord Ward, and the Lead of Christ crowned with thorns, the property of the Rev. Mr. Gillies, being the fragment of a fresco of "The Crucifixion," wonderful for expression and breadth.

And what shall we say to that singular conceit—a mixture of playful fancy and earnest devotional feeling—"The Adoration of the Shepherds," by Sandro Botticelli, formerly in the Ottley Collection, now the property of Mr. Maitland? Surely, a more original conception of the pencil never came before us; surely, never one to which the painter's whole soul, his every resource, were more lavishly and lovingly dedicated In the centre is the humble shed which the Holy Family have made their temporary refuge; and there, conducted by angels, the shepherds come to do honour to the Saviour, kneeling on either side. The blessed mother shares in the same feeling of reverential joy, and kneels, her hands meekly joined, in adoration of the divine Infant. Joseph, in an attitude of contemplation, completes the group. Above, kneeling on the thatched roof of the shed, are three angels; and higher still in the air are a host of angels dancing in a circle; below, in the foreground, angels and saints embracing; whilst Satan, at sight of the triumph of human salvation, steals away, crawling on his belly

Another large work, also from the Ottley Collection, and now the property of Mr. Maitland, being an altarpiece by Cosimo Roselli, is equally singular for the extravagance of its composition with the last, but of a less agreeable, less fascinating, influence. It represents "The Sacrifice of the Mass"—the Saviour, clothed in a heavy black ornamented dress, with a crown on his head, standing on the sacramental cup, his hands extended in the attitude of the Crucifixion; whilst saints kneel on either side, and angels, some of them scattering flowers, hover above. The faces are marked with great gravity and religious fervour; but the subject is one in which at the present day it is impossible to sympathise, though we may give full credit to the sentiment which inspired the artist in its treatment. Neither do we find our feelings much engaged in contemplating the elaborately ornamented compositions of Crivelli, an early Venetian painter, but little known in this country. In looking at them we see at once that we are in a different region of art, forming a connecting link between the Gothicism of the early German and the classicism of the Italian schools; but we cannot help observing, also, that the style is genuine, and that a real fervour pervades it. The severity remarkable in the heads in the large picture of "The Madonna and Child Enthroned" was always a characteristic of the Venetian school, in the midst of all its love of colour and ornamental treatment; and in the "Pieta" the articulation of the veins and muscles, and the angry-looking gaping wound in the hand, show a stern reality of purpose, which disdained to soften the most painful incidents out of consideration for mere esthetics. Both these pictures are the property of Lord Ward.

Giovanni Bellini is represented in a "Portrait of a Young Man," sketchily treated, the property of Mr. Holford; a "St. Francis in the Desert" receiving the stigmata, the property of Mr. Dingwall; and, more important than either, in a picture of "Christ on the Mount of Olives," the property of the Rev. Mr. Devonport Bromley. This last is painted with very full-bodied colours, and is remarkable for its treatment of the subject, which is almost identical with that of the same subject by Andrea Mantegna, which is close at hand. We refer not only to the bold but rather crude outline in the foreshortening of the figures, but to the general character of the two compositions, and of the scenes in which they are placed. This resemblance between them is explained when it is recollected that Mantegna was the brother-in-law of Bellini, and that they wrought much together, mutually instructing one another—Bellini in what related to colouring, Mantegna in design. By Mantegna, also, we have a very impressive "Pieta," the property of the Royal Liverpool Institution; a "Judith," the property of the Earl of Pembroke, so full of dignity and tenderness of character, and of such exquisite finish, that when in the collection of Charles I. it was attributed to Raphael; "The Triumph of Scipio," the property of Mr. Vivian; and "Christ Bearing the Cross," from Christchurch, Oxford. The last two are on a larger scale and of a different style of treatment to the other.

There are half a dozen pictures by Francia, contributed by her Majesty, Lord Ward, Lord Northwick, &c., amongst which we particularly remark, as perhaps most important, one of "The Baptism of Christ," the property of Mr. H. Labouchere, formerly belonging to Mr. Coningham. The figure of Christ is full of nobleness and dignity; that of the St. John beams with a becoming reverential sentiment. On one side are angels, who hold the robe of Our Lord; on the other two soldiers, in Oriental costume. The handling of every part is very careful and finished, the colour is of the most generous richness and warmth, and the whole feeling which breathes through the picture is of that pure religious sentiment which distinguished the early Bolognese school.

In close affinity with the Bolognese school were those of Umbria; and Pietro Perugino was the last of the long line of their patient pious labourers who prepared the way for the great Raphael. This elegant and charming painter, in his richest creative mood, is admirably illustrated by five predella pictures, the property of Mr. Alexander Barker, representing "The Nativity," "The Baptism," "Christ and the Woman of Samaria," "The Resurrection," and the "Noli me Tangere." Space will not allow us to go into the details of these remarkable productions, which will amply repay the most careful scrutiny. In all of them the simplicity of the design, the freedom from overcrowding, and from all intrusion of unnecessary accessories will be at once apparent, as well as the space and airiness which in consequence reign through the canvas. We cannot pass from these, however, without paying a special tribute to the beautiful fancy displayed in the group of the Holy Family in "The Nativity," Joseph kneeling on the one side of the Infant Christ, his hands raised in devout admiration; whilst on the other Mary kneels in prayer, her face beaming with mingled maternal pride and religious fervour. In "The Baptism," too, whilst the figure of the Saviour reminds one of that in Francia's picture, a still more refined devotional character prevails than Francia attained to; and the transparency of the water in which he stands is wonderfully realised.

With Fra Bartolomeo, the most earnest, eloquent, and noble of the early Florentine painters, and who exercised a direct and powerful influence upon Raphael himself, we close our inspection of the preparatory schools of art. Of his pencil we have two specimens, marked with all his peculiar dignity of character and mellowness of colouring—one, "The Madonna with Infant Christ and St. John the Baptist," the property of Earl Cowper; the other, "The Marriage of St. Catharine," belonging to Mr. A. Darby. Interesting also, for the association of two great names, we remark "The Legend of the Cintola," representing the ascension of the Virgin, who drops her girdle on St. Thomas—the joint production of Fra Bartolomeo and Raphael.

"WAITING FOR THE VERDICT."

PAINTED BY A. SOLOMON

FROM THE EXHIBITION OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

Now that Mr. Solomon's picture is generally considered, if not the greatest, certainly one of the greatest works of the year, it would be supererogatory in us to repeat the praise we have already given it incidentally, or to again remark that we scarcely remember so sudden a change in an artist's subject and treatment, and an equally unexpected development of originality and power. Our Engraving, likewise, so fully displays Mr. Solomon's ability in telling a sad story, that any lengthened examination on our part would be quite unnecessary. We may, however, remark that an objection has been made that "there is no clue to guide us in judging whether there is guilt or not," and that "there may be unfounded suspicion." Now, this would deprive the picture of nearly all its moral value, and could not have been the artist's intention. It appears to us that his every line in every picture and expression, could scarcely show more plainly that they feel the overwhelming probability that the issue must be the worst. A crime has evidently been committed. The heedless and utter despair of the wife would seem, indeed, to intimate that she is cognisant of her husband's guilt, and conscious that a fearful doom perhaps death itself is impending over him. The old father's attitude is equally hopeless, as he buries his honest face in his toil-worn hands, to hide the shame and grief for his only son "which will "bring down his grey hairs with sorrow to the grave"—that son who, instead of being the support of the declining years of both his parents, leaves them, with his poor wife and children, to be mutual sources of anxiety, and—oh! greatest cruelty of all heaps upon them a load of infamy. That sister, too, whose beautiful profile might well suggest that she may require the protection of a brother could best afford. But can she be only his half sister? And has long ill-usage of the now thin and haggard wife so effaced all resemblance between them? Then, the frank, comely face of the prisoner's mother does not express anxiety, although it is brimful of the grief which trickles over from her eyes and is almost choking her, despite her efforts to cheer the rest, by that more than manly self-denying bravery which women show on such occasions; and despite also the mother's instinct which shines through her tears in a momentary smile at the crowing of her infant grandchild, which she so affectionately tends during the paroxysm of its mother's agony. The innocent babe joyfully recognises its mother, and holds out its little hands for the accustomed caress; but she hears and heeds it not, forgetting in her vacant misery even her own offspring. The only thing which appears to us capable of being construed in any way into uncertainty is the anxious look of the young sister at the half-opened door of the court, whence we may suppose the barrister is bringing the verdict. But is she not, from her years, less able to realise the fact of the crime having been committed, and from her inexperience less ready to believe its possibility? And, as if to remove even the faintest glimmer of hope, the man of law himself is giving a sidelong look of pity in the direction in which the prisoner must be placed; and we get a glimpse of the judge who will soon pronounce, in bodeful, solemn silence, the inevitable sentence.

But this very hopelessness, which we think gives the picture its great moral value and dramatic completeness, has actually been considered a defect: and still stranger objections have been made, namely, that the subject is too painful for representation: that the moral of misery should not be put into a pictorial form unless it have a happy end: that the work fails because, forsooth, it is not adapted for the drawing-room, dining-room, or boudoir. Now (passing by altogether Mr. Ruskin's paradox, that the subject is too painful to be invested with the charm of colour), we would ask Mr. Solomon's other critics why the function of the artist in particular should be thus circumscribed? We allow the author, the poet, the dramatist, even the musician, to choose painful themes, and teach us by terrible examples. In respect to the domestic drama (which affords the nearest parallel), much of it is extremely painful; but who will say that it is less exalting and purifying than the choicest specimens of heroic grief—the French classical tragedies? Why, we should have had no Hogarth, we should have lost some of Wilkie's best works, and a host of others, if such canons of criticism had been accepted. Finally, lest we lose patience altogether at the destination to which so fine an art are to be accommodated, and say something which Mr. Solomon himself might consider rude, seeing he has been hitherto a most elegant and successful painter for the drawing-room, we would ask, is painting to have no ethical or public influence whatever? The old masters did not consecrate their glowing and prayerful pencils to the decoration of private dwellings; and, now that the national importance of painting has been sufficiently limited by the withdrawal of the demand for religious subjects, let us not circumscribe it further. Why, we might, surely, instance our Engraving itself in support of our argument, for who shall say what good it may effect upon many whom words would not touch? We might also point out the extreme inconsistency of acknowledging that this is the best picture Mr. Solomon has painted, and yet recommend him to go back to his former subjects. But Mr. Solomon must be too well aware that it is his serious choice of subject which, by awakening new powers and concentrating all his energies, has obtained him this success: he will, therefore, never dream of taking such advice.

"MILAN CATHEDRAL."—PAINTED BY SAMUEL READ.—FROM THE EXHIBITION OF THE SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER-COLOURS.

"MILAN CATHEDRAL,"
PAINTED BY S. READ.
FROM THE EXHIBITION OF THE SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER-COLOURS.

We can witness, with all who have been inside the noble Duomo of Milan, to Mr. Read's fidelity to its general effect of magnitude, and, at the same time, conscientious attention to its detail; together proving that the artist must have worked his drawing very nearly up to its present condition on the spot, and not contented himself, as is too often done, by bringing away a few rough sketches. This is precisely the quality which renders his work especially desirable for engraving, and proportionately precious to those who would preserve an unsophisticated impression of the grandeur and vastness of the stupendous cathedral. "In the pile itself there resides a solemnity which collects the soul and inspires devotion. How awful its distant obscurities! how expanding the vacuum of its high embowered roof! how reverend the shadowings of its painted light! how affecting the family groups kneeling at wide intervals in the vacant nave! what a picture this for Peter Neefs and his associates!" So said Forsyth fifty years ago, before any work like this could prove the capabilities of water colours for the representations of such subjects. But this classical traveller was perfectly right in respect to the solemnity which broods over the interior. Its exterior, in common with that of Strasburg, Cologne, Rouen, and many others, will vividly affect the mind with wonder and admiration; but we think no work of men's hands so fills and elevates the soul with infinite awe, and, so to express ourselves, sublime humility, as the interior of a fine cathedral, with its calm holy twilight, which veils its lofty vaultings and dims its distant vistas. And this applies especially to the subject of the picture which we have engraved, for from the extreme smallness of the clerestory windows the effect is more than usually gloomy.

Mr. Read has chosen one of the most picturesque points of view—that which looks diagonally across the space inclosed by the pillars that support the octagonal cupola, towards the steps leading to the high altar, and which includes a portion of the north transept and of the circuit wall of the choir. The east end or apsis, which is probably the most ancient or original portion of the structure, would afford the finest view were not its effect destroyed by the encumbrances which surround and form part of the high altar. A rich tone is diffused over the interior by it being entirely composed of a particular description of marble brought from above the Lago Maggiore, to which time gives a fine yellow tint; and the pavement is laid in a mosaic pattern of red, blue, and white marble, thus completing the finish of the structure. We might occupy columns in describing even the portion of the interior included in the picture, but we will confine ourselves to a few facts which may refresh the memory of our readers.

The great feature of the interior is its gigantic clustered pillars. There are four ranges, with nine intercommunications. No less than fifty-two pillars support the vaultings of the roof, which, springing directly from them, give an appearance of even greater loftiness than they would otherwise convey; although each pillar of the nave and chancel (including, of course, those in the picture) measures, capital and base inclusive, no less than 80 feet. The capitals were designed by Fillipino of Modena, and are beautiful in themselves, although it is the opinion of the best architects that the leading lines of the building are much interrupted by the shrines which are introduced, and the apparent solidity of the structure also injured. This shrine-work is perfectly unique, and there is nothing to parallel to it, either in the work itself, or in the manner it is here introduced. The lowest part of the capitals is formed by a wreath of foliage mixed with figures of children and animals; above is a circle of eight niches, corresponding to the intervals between the eight shafts of the clustered pillar, each containing a statue covered by a canopy. The bases and plans of the pillars are equally anomalous. The diameter of the four pillars which support the cupola (three of which are embraced in the view) is one-fifth greater than that of the others. Two of these immense pillars, between which the procession is entering the choir, are encircled by pulpits of bronze and silver, begun by the directions of the exemplary San Carlo, and completed by his nephew, Cardinal Frederigo Borromeo. These are covered by basso-relievos by Andrea Pellizone, and rest on colossal caryatides representing the symbols of the four Evangelists, and the four Doctors of the Church, St. Gregory, St. Jerome, St. Ambrose, and St. Augustine, modelled by Brambilla and cast by Busca. The circuit wall of the choir towards the aisles, a small portion only of which is shown in the picture, is covered with basso-relievos, representing the history of the Virgin in a grand style. The religuary pendant in the vaulting of the octagon over the altar is said to contain one of the nails of the cross, which annually, on the Feast of the Invention of the Holy Cross, is exposed on the altar, and carried in procession through the city. The choir was finished by Pelligrini. Within are richly-carved stalls of walnut, with bas-reliefs representing the history of St. Augustine and St. Ambrose. The organ-cases are rich with gilded carving and paintings of Figini, Camillo, Procaccini, and Giuseppe Meda. It is a part of the Rito, or Catto Ambrogiano, which our readers are aware is the form of worship the whole of the ancient Archbishopric of Milan, that no instrument be permitted but the organ. The Ambrosian ritual is in the West almost the only national liturgy which has been spared by the Roman Church, and is probably much older than the Roman Liturgy. The building of the cathedral, though commenced towards the end of the fourteenth century, is yet unfinished, and the scaffolds have always been standing in some part of the edifice.

For general criticism on the building we cannot do better than again quote from Forsyth the following passage:—

The Cathedral of Milan has been wonderfully contrived to bury millions of money in ornaments which are never to be seen. Whole quarries of marble have been manufactured here into statues, relievos, niches, and notches; and high sculpture has been squandered on objects which vanish individually in the mass. Were two or three thousand of those statues removed the rest would regain their due importance, and the fabric itself become more intelligible. Those figures stand in rows, which cross and confound the vertical direction of the architecture: for here the eye naturally runs up the channeled pillars, the lofty windows and long mullions, the lateral, and the spiral ornaments, and never can keep in the horizontal line of the Greek entablature. Their rage for sculpture has encircled the very tops of the pillars with statues, which tend to conceal the groinings, just where they spring so finely into the vault, which interrupt the immeasurable plumb-line, and which lessen the apparent height and the exility admired in a Gothic pillar.

THE NEUFCHATEL TREATY.—The following are the principal clauses of this treaty: His Majesty the King of Prussia consents to renounce for ever, for himself, his heirs, and successors, all sovereign rights over the principality of Neufchâtel and the county of Valangin. The State of Neufchâtel, dependent henceforth upon itself, will continue to form part of the Swiss Confederation in the same manner as the other cantons. The Swiss Confederation will defray all the expenses resulting from the events of September, 1856. The canton of Neufchâtel cannot be called upon to contribute towards the payment except as in the same measure as any other canton, and in the pro rata of its money contingent. An entire and full amnesty will be granted for all political or military offences or misdeeds connected with late events, and in favour of all the Neufchâtelese, Swiss, or foreigners, and especially in favour of the militiamen, who by crossing into a foreign land escaped the obligation of taking arms.

COLOURATION OF POISONS.—We quote from the Lancet the following results which have been arrived at by Dr Moffatt, of Hawarden, in relation to carbo-azotic acid. This acid is recommended for the colouring of poisons for the following among other reasons:—Its colouring power is so great that one grain is sufficient to impart a distinct yellow colour to 70 000 grains, or one gallon of water. The taste is so intensely bitter that in the above proportions it imparts a very decided bitterness. Carbo-azotic acid also possesses the valuable property, which is peculiar to itself, of giving a yellow colour to the skin, when taken for three or four days in doses of one grain per diem, which colouration would be easily distinguished from jaundice by any medical man. A saturated solution of carbo-azotic acid in prussic acid does not appear to modify the therapeutic action of that potent remedy. The colour imparted by it to water is permanent. Carbo-azotic acid does not produce any deleterious effect upon the system.

UPTHILL'S PRINCESS ROYAL OF ENGLAND STRAWBERRIES.—We have just seen, at Mr. Cuthill's Nursery, Denmark-hill, Camberwell, a dish of this new and delicious variety of the strawberry. They are very early only a few days later than the Black Prince, and are much finer in flavour than last year. Many single plants have upon them the very large number of from 150 to near 200 fruit.

CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A. DE R., PARIS.—A communication has been forwarded by post.

W. MACRAE.—By some mishap your first communication (March was anxiously looked for, never reached its destination; to the second a reply shall be dispatched by the very next mail.

W. A. S., Haddon.—The interest felt in Chess by the members of your Club can hardly be so fervent as you represent it, or they would surely contrive to obtain some relief from the game, and spare themselves the necessity of publicly asking such questions as "Which is the correct manner of Castling?" "Is it necessary to say Check to the Queen?" and "Can the King Castle out of Check?"

CATAIR.—He could neither Castle nor move his King in the way you describe after playing the Rook.

BOX, SEN., Manchester.—By whom was it composed, and what is the solution?

F. W. will perhaps be good enough to forward another Diagram. His first is almost entirely illegible, and the position of the pieces in it is reversed.

H. T. S.—The analysis seems accurate, and, though we demur to the conclusion, many of the variations are extremely clever.

SECRETARY.—1. The inventor of the very useful "In State Quo" Chess Envelopes is the manufacturer of the "Staunton" Chessmen, Messrs. Jaques, of Hatton garden. 2. The editors of the "Berlin Chess Magazine" are Messrs Andersen and Dufresne; and the London publishers Messrs Williams and Norgate.

ALPHA.—You will find some extremely beautiful Mate Problems in a selection just made by Herr Löwenthal from a number contributed to what is called a "Problem Tournament," by many of the first composers of the day. Herr Löwenthal's brochure is published by Bell, 186, Fleet-street, London.

ROLFE.—There is no Problem at present.

R. F. S., Dublin.—You are right. Black would win a piece. The variation was taken from the German authorities but is evidently erroneous.

MATCH BETWEEN THE HUDDERSFIELD AND LEEDS CHESS CLUBS.

—The match between these clubs, the first portion of which was played at Leeds, and the last under at Huddersfield, has just terminated. The Huddersfield players were Messrs. John Walkinson, D. Marsden, W. Scott, G. H. Taylor, J. R. Robinson, G. Brook, E. W. Tarn, T. Parratt, D. Robinson, M. Webb. Leeds was represented by Messrs. J. Rhodes, Millard, Cadman, Clarke, W. Mann, B. Simpson, J. Mann, Rennert, W. C. Myres, Andrews, and Gardiner. Each player fought three games, the total number played being 36, of which Huddersfield scored 17, Leeds, 13; and 6 were drawn.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

The long-pending lawsuit between the State (of France) and the Count de Chambord has been recently decided in favour of the latter. The Crown will, it is thought, appeal to the Court of Cassation.

The Yarmouth Standard, a cheap weekly Conservative paper, which came into existence a few weeks since, has come to a premature end, as the proprietors have found it to be "not sufficiently remunerative." The Norwich Weekly Express, one of the same class of journals, met with a similar fate after a few months' existence.

A meeting of gentlemen interested in our fisheries was held on Saturday last, at the Craven Hotel, Strand, for the purpose of forming an association having for its object the attainment of improved legislation on this subject.

The Sacred College at Rome has just concluded with Baron de Rothschild a new loan of 3,800,000 Roman crowns (about £360,000), intended to be employed in coining in the copper money.

On Saturday last a meeting of the Warehousemen and Clerks' Schools took place at Hatcham-grove House, New-cross—Lord John Russell in the chair—when there was an examination of the pupils in divinity, English history, geography, biography, English grammar and literature, Latin, and arithmetic. More than 800 ladies and gentlemen were present.

The cholera has broken out again with great violence in Essequibo, Wakenaam Island.

The inauguration of the Louvre, on the occasion of the fête of the Emperor of the French, in August, is to be marked by great pomp. The twofold distribution of recompenses to the artists who have cooperated in the construction of the great work now completed, and of the premiums awarded at the Exhibition of Living Artists, will, it is said, take place together on August 14, the day before the Emperor's fête.

Two hundred workmen were on Saturday last discharged from the carriage department in the Royal Arsenal, Woolwich; and about the same number from various departments have received notice to leave.

The sale of several of Paul Delaroche's pictures took place at Paris on Saturday last, and attracted a vast crowd of dealers and amateurs to the Auction Mart. The prices obtained were very high.

In the year 1856-57 the sum total of £202,467 was expended on national collections: £46,480 was appropriated to the British Museum establishment, £19,768 to the buildings, and £20,454 to purchases; £12,977 to the National Gallery; £881 to scientific works and experiments; £500 to the Royal Geographical Society; £85,986 to the Department of Science and Art; £2312 to the Museum of Practical Geology, and £1000 to the Royal Society. The total amount expended on the purchase and laying out of the Kensington Gore Estate from 1851 to 1856 inclusive is £277,305.

A court martial having been held on board the Victory guardship, to try the late Paymaster of her Majesty's ship Childers, on the respective charges of embezzlement, inebriety, and neglect of duty, the Court, after examining the several witnesses, sentenced the prisoner to be placed at the bottom of the list.

In the course of the proceedings at the Crystal Palace rehearsal on Saturday last, Messrs. Negretti and Zambra succeeded in taking some most effective photographic views of the orchestral and general arrangements.

A return has just been published of the ships belonging to English owners captured by Riff pirates off the coast of Morocco since Jan. 1, 1856. They are eight in number—four of them have been recaptured.

The Emperor Francis Joseph, it is stated, has just signed an ordinance which prescribes that two-thirds at least of the public offices of Hungary are to be confided to natives. The authorities are also enjoined to receive documents addressed to the government in the national language. It is in contemplation to grant a full amnesty to all military prisoners.

The Excise salary petition lately presented to Parliament by Mr Charles Cowan, M.P., has been returned to that gentleman as "informal," for having prayed the House to "grant an augmentation of salary compatible with their stations as officers of a most important revenue department" of being contrary to Parliamentary regulations to receive any petition "praying for public money."

The yellow fever still prevails in some of the West India Islands, chiefly amongst the shipping at St. Thomas and Martinique; the other parts of the West Indies appear to be free from it. All the persons belonging to the Perseus, the last homeward mail-steamer, who were struck with yellow fever, and left behind at St. Thomas, are dead.

In consequence of the opening of the Maçon and Culoz Railway section the journey from Paris to Turin can now be performed in thirty-one hours.

The prizes awarded by the examiners of the Society of Arts to the successful candidates at the June examination in London will be distributed on the morning of Tuesday next, at the society's house in the Adelphi. The society's annual dinner will take place at the Crystal Palace in the afternoon of the same day. Lord Stanley, M.P., will preside.

From all parts of the vine-growing countries in France the most satisfactory reports of the appearance of the plants are received. Accounts from the hop districts of that country are also very good; and the crops are stated to be in the most favourable condition.

The estates of James Sadleir, situated in the counties of Waterford, Tipperary, and Limerick, are advertised for sale on Tuesday, the 7th of July. The petitioner for the sale is the official manager for winding up the affairs of the Tipperary Bank.

The annual Caledonian grand fancy-dress ball will be given on Monday next. The ladies patronesses met on Monday afternoon to complete the preliminary arrangements.

According to the Mercure d'Apt (Vaucluse), the almond-trees, which are one of the sources of riches of that part of the country, are this year loaded with fruit, and all the kinds, particularly those used for the table and by confectioners, give promise of being exceedingly fine.

A requisition, numerously signed by several of the leading mercantile firms of the City, by Mr. Mechi (the present Sheriff), and influential members of the Court of Common Council, is about to be presented to Mr. Rupell, M.P. for Lambeth, requesting him to stand as a candidate for the office of Sheriff of London, the election for which will take place on the 24th inst

Some dromedaries recently sent by the Viceroy of Egypt as a present to the Emperor Napoleon III have attracted much curiosity at Marseilles, where they have been employed drawing a piece of artillery and its ammunition-waggon.

There are 31,630 persons in official departments paying income-tax whose incomes exceed £100 and are under £150; and there are 64 receiving £5000 a year and upwards.

The third annual meeting of the International Congress of Statistics is to be held at Vienna, on the 31st August next, and is to be attended by economists of all countries.

On Monday afternoon the annual distribution of prizes to the successful students of the London Hospital for the past year took place in the new theatre of the institution. In the absence of Lord Blandford through indisposition Mr R. Hanbury presided, and was supported by the council, the governors, the professors, and their friends

Alcide Dorpland, the veteran naturalist, and friend and fellow-traveller of Alexander von Humboldt, has, notwithstanding his great age, just set out on a journey of botanical research in Paraguay.

The Hermitage Museum in St. Petersburg has recently been enriched by a magnificent collection of coins and medals, purchased by command of the Emperor from the heirs of the late Count Perowsky. It contains many thousand specimens of extremely rare coins of different epochs, amongst which may be particularly mentioned the silver and bronze money of the time of the Sophora Kings.

On Monday Mr. Benjamin Samuel Phillips was unanimously chosen an Alderman for the Ward of Farringdon Within.

The new schoolhouse of the Philological School, New-road, was opened on Monday by his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury.

The Government has granted a loan of £40,000 for the completion of the Limerick and Kanna Railway.

From the hop-growing districts—notwithstanding complaints of the prevalence of flies, fleas, aphides, and other vermin—the accounts are generally favourable.

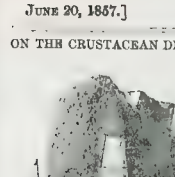
On the 29th of May the propeller Inkermann blew up at Toronto, and eleven persons were killed, several others being seriously injured.

Arrangements have been entered into by the Montreal Ocean Steam Navigation Company and the Provincial Government of Canada for a weekly line of steamers, instead of fortnightly, as at present, between Liverpool and Canada.

M. Victor Foncher, who drew up the first draught of the new Military Code, has been named by the Emperor of the French Grand Officer of the Legion of Honour. The same rank has been conferred on General Allard, who drew up the Report from the Council of State.

The Kilkenny journals of Saturday last report several burglaries and robberies perpetrated in that county during the past week. No acts of violence to the persons were committed by the robbers.

ON THE CRUSTACEAN DELICACIES OF THE TABLE.



MOST interesting is the exhibition presented at this season of the year by the fish-markets and shops of the leading metropolitan fishmongers—an exhibition well worthy of inspection. There, mighty salmon, with their silvery sides, lie at length on the cool slab; trout, their near relatives, attract the eye of the epicure; magnificent turbots, from the coasts of Durham or Yorkshire, from Heligoland, or from the sandbanks off the French coast, thick, firm, and round, demand the inspection of the connoisseur. Nor is the dory absent (the Zeus or Jupiter of the Romans; Il Janatore, the gatekeeper—in allusion to the finger-marks of St. Peter—of the Adriatic fishermen; Zeus faber, Linn.) The superlative merit of this fish, we may observe en passant, was first appreciated by the celebrated Mr. Quin, the prince of epicures. There, beautiful in roseate hues, the striped red mullet (Mullus surmuletus) attracts our eye, and by its side reposes the grey mullet (Mugil capito), each belonging to a very different group. There glistens the mackerel (Scomber scombrus), with its marbled stripes of green and blue, and its silvery sides; and there, as if by way of contrast, rests the "sapphirine gurnard" (Trigla hirundo), with its uncouth bony head and its winglike fins. The long slender-snouted garfish, or sea pike (Belone vulgaris), reminding us of an attenuated or rackstretched mackerel, extends itself along the slab, while on a bed of grass reposes its fierce fresh-water relative, the pike, or jack (Esox lucius) —the Esox or Lucis of heraldry and of Shakspeare. Perchance a vast sturgeon (Acipenser sturio), mail clad, though more formidable in appearance than reality, allied as it is to the sharks, proves an object of attraction. In July, 1833, a sturgeon, measuring eight feet six inches in length, and weighing 205 pounds, was caught near Flushorn, in Scotland; and Pennant records an instance in which a fish of this species, taken in the Esk, weighed 460 pounds. This is the fish which produces caviar and isinglass; and in the Caspian Sea a most important fishery is conducted on a regulated system. Over the sturgeon hangs a grotesque little monster, known as the lump-fish, or lump-sucker, sometimes called the sea owl (Cyclopterus lumpus), a creature as ugly in form as it is beautiful in colour—purple, blue, rose pink, and rich orange passing into each other, or forming well-ordered contrasts. Of soles, and other ordinary flat fish, we say nothing. Nor of the eels, which, lingering in the little tank, are, perhaps, anticipating the fate of Marsyas. The conger eel (Conger vulgaris) is not unfrequently to be seen, though its flesh is little in request. Nor are lampreys (the lamprey, Pteromyzon marinus, and the lampern, or river lamprey, Pteromyzon fluviatilis) by any means uncommon. Perch, carp, and tench, the supply of the river, lake, or pond, give variety to the collection; and with these we must conclude our catalogue, merely observing that not a fish we have enumerated but is worthy of an express article.

We have detailed a fine assortment of fish, an assortment to which we might add the sea bream, the angler (Lophius), the wolf-fish (Anarrhichas), the wrasse (Labrus maculatus), and others, as accidental displays, were the enumeration of fish to be seen in the London shops or markets (as Hungerford for instance) our main purpose. Beautiful as is the tableau (not imaginary) thus exhibited, it is not complete: it wants relief, and this is afforded by the crustacea—creatures which, if we were not familiar with them, would excite surprise or admiration. Familiarity often leads us to overlook objects which upon closer scrutiny prove to be replete with interest; and such is the case with regard to the crustacea. We are in the habit of seeing them on the slabs or in the baskets of the fishmonger, and also at our own tables, where they are usually welcomed as delicacies; but how few who gladly partake of them ever give themselves the trouble to inquire into their history! Let us here endeavour to interest our readers in their behalf.

The term crustacea (anglicised, Crustacens) is too well understood to need explanation. It contains an extensive group of beings, most of which are aquatic, some few terrestrial, ranging from the crab or lobster to the woodlouse (Oniscus murarius) and the fossil trilobites, and including many parasitic forms. Of these crustacea, some are of large dimensions, but numbers are microscopic or nearly so. Teeming in countless myriads, they render the waves of the ocean, especially in the warmer latitudes, luminous at night; so that the prow of the vessel cuts through sparkling foam, while a gleaming expanse around hides and obscures all that is distance.

Of the thousands of crustacea with which naturalists are more or less intimately acquainted, several species are esteemed as articles of food, not only in Europe, but in other portions of the globe, as the violet crab, in the West Indies; and the robber crab, or Birgus latro, in the islands of the South Pacific. It is, however, to those species only with which we, in our island, are familiar as delicacies that we purpose here to invite attention.

We may enumerate them as follows, irrespective of systematic order:—

1. The Lobster (Astacus marinus); L'Ecrevisse Homard of the French.
2. The River Crayfish (Astacus fluviatilis); L'Ecrevisse commune.
3. The Sea Crayfish of the London fishmongers (Palinurus vulgaris, vel quadricornis); La Langouste.
4. The Crab (Cancer pagurus); Le Crabe Poupart ou Tourteau.
5. The Grubbin, or Crabbin (Cancer pubor); L'Etrille commune. In the London markets termed Shrid.
6. The Common Shrimp (Crangon vulgaris), Le Cardon, Le Crevette ou Chrevette.
7. The White, Pink, Gravseend, or Medway Shrimp; Shrimp-Prawn (Palæmon squilla); Le Salicque.
8. The Prawn (Palæmon serratis), Le Langoustin.

Among these crustaceans the lobster claims precedence, both from the estimation in which it is held and its commercial importance. This valued crustacean was not unknown to the ancients, and is the Astacus (Astacos) of Aristotle. It is abundant along the rocky parts of our coast, and of that of the adjacent continent; and everywhere a system of destruction is energetically carried on against it, traps and nets being employed for its capture. Millions are annually taken. Vast is the demand, and as profuse is the supply. Consider the consumption of London alone, including its environs, and to this add that of the cities and large or moderate towns throughout our island, and even then we shall scarcely be able to form an adequate estimate of the multitude consumed during the season from spring to autumn. Almost incalculable as is the annual destruction of this crustacean, still the loss is counterbalanced by an according increase. Were it not so, the species would long since have become, if not extinct, at least rare along our coasts. By a wisely-ordered law its fecundity fully secures it from apparent numerical diminution. More than 12,000 eggs were counted by Dr. Baster under the tail of one female lobster, besides the quantity of coral (so called because of its red colour after boiling), or undeveloped eggs, which still remained within the body, to be subsequently brought forth.

Although great quantities of lobsters are taken on different parts of our coast and that of Scotland, London at least draws its principal supply from Norway. The fishmongers distinguish them as the Channel lobsters, Scotch lobsters, and Norway lobsters. In the first the flesh, though very delicate, is apt to be watery, and is always less firm and rich than that of the Norway lobster; the shell, when boiled, is of a paler red, and marbled or spotted, as it is also, though to a less degree, in the Scotch. Hence, both for weight and firmness, as well as for flavour, the Norway lobster is preferred. A writer in the "Encyclopædia Britannica" says, speaking of the turbot, "a preference is given in the London market to those (turbots) caught by the Dutch, who are supposed to have drawn not less than £80,000 a year for the supply of this market alone; and the Danes (Norwegians) from £12,000 to £25,000 a year for sauce to this luxury of the table, extracted from one million of lobsters taken on the rocky shores of Norway—though our own shores are in many parts plentifully supplied with this marine insect equal in goodness to those of Norway.

On one day of June, in the year 1855, thirty thousand lobsters were delivered at Billingsgate Market. This, however, was an extraordinary influx, and chiefly consisted of exports from Norway and Scotland.

We may here observe that the lobsters are brought over from Norway in a living state, during the season, by vessels constantly plying between the Thames and Norway. On entering the river the lobsters are placed in large wooden cases, properly perforated, and deposited in a creek, called Hole Haven, on the Essex side of the Thames, near the upper part of the sea-reach, whence they are transmitted to Billingsgate according to the demand. The above observations apply in a general sense to the Scotch lobsters, which are all brought alive to Billingsgate.

We have said that the lobster-season commences in spring and continues till autumn. We here allude more particularly to those imported from Norway and northern Scotland; but, it may be added, this season is liable to variation—its commencement being sometimes retarded by the state of the weather. Along the more southern parts of our coast lobsters are taken at a much earlier period. Mr. Travis, of Scarborough, in a letter to Mr. Pennant, October, 1768, says—"We have vast numbers of fine lobsters on the rocks near our coast. The large ones are, in general, in their best season from the middle of October to the beginning of May. Many of the large ones, and some fewer of the larger sorts, are good all the summer. If they be four inches and a half long, or upwards, from the tip of the head to the end of the back shell, they are called sizeable lobsters; if only four inches, they are esteemed half-size; and when sold, two of them are reckoned for one of full size. If they be under four inches, they are called pawks, and are not saleable to the carriers, though, in reality, they are, in the summer months, superior to the large ones in goodness."

The following extract from the same letter bears upon what we have said respecting the fecundity of the lobster, and is otherwise very interesting:—"The female or hen lobster does not cast her shell the same year (query, at the same portion of the year) that she deposits her ova—or, in the common phrase, is in berry. When the ova first appear under her tail they are very small, and extremely black; but they become, in succession, almost as large as ripe elderberries before they are deposited, and turn of a dark brown colour, especially towards the end of her time of depositing them. They (the hen lobsters) continue full, and deposit the ova in constant succession as long as any of that black substance can be found in their body, which when boiled turns of a beautiful red colour, and is called their coral. Hen lobsters [he refers to those along the coast of Scarborough] are found in berry at all times of the year, but chiefly in winter. It is a common mistake that a berried hen is always in perfection for the table;—when her berries appear large and brownish she will always be found exhausted, watery, and poor. Though the ova are cast at all times of the year, they seem only to come to life during the warm summer months of July and August."

We agree with the writer of the above passage that, as a rule, the male lobster is firmer and better flavoured than the female; the male is easily distinguishable by the narrowness of the tail (exclusive of other marks), which on comparison cannot be overlooked; and we also subscribe to his opinion that the flesh of the claw is more delicate than that of the so-called tail.

The lobster (how will the epicure relish the statement?) is one of the scavengers of the sea: it is a carnivorous marauder, feasting alike upon dead or living animal matters, and is evidently endowed with a high sense of smell, by the exercise of which, vulture-like, it scents its prey at a distance. It prowls about in the deep water among submerged rocks, or darts with arrow-like velocity from its retreat when the waves carry to it the promise of a banquet. "Where the carcass is there will the eagles be gathered together;" for eagles we may read in the present instance lobsters, crabs, shrimps, and a host besides of marine predatory creatures, both great and small, all of which hasten to the feast.

The carnivorous voracity of the lobster (and also of the crab) leads to its destruction. Some animals, like the fox or the wolf, fear even the appearance of a trap, and refuse to take the bait; but the lobster is not wise, it has no cerebral development (the nervous system in the crustacea being ganglionic), and is merely guided by instinctive impulse. Hence baited traps or "pots" made of strong twigs, somewhat on the principle of a wire mouse-trap, lowered into the water and marked with a buoy, or a series of buoys, according to the number let down, are the most effectual and ordinary means employed in the capture of these epicurean crustaceans. In some parts of the coast, as at Scarborough, strong bag-nets are employed. These taps are baited with garbage attractive to the lobster, who unsuspiciously enters a prison from which he emerges only like a condemned malefactor, to suffer bonds, by which his claws are secured, and then transportation in a dark tank to a distant place of punishment, where the fate of being boiled alive (if he die not on the passage) most assuredly awaits him.

TO MY DICTIONARY.

BY E. G. HOLLAND.

WHAT art thou, book? A mass of words
All lifeless as a stone?
The fossil sounds of bygone times
Transmitted to our own?
Thy space I measure with my hand,
Thy weight I scarcely feel,
And, though I read thee many times,
No spark shall light my zeal
"Words, words, words!" These, and only these,
In isolation stand,
An independent multitude
With no uniting band.

All cold and lifeless is thy page;
Thou ne'er hast known a tear,
Nor brought from out the joy-filled heart
One laugh of earnest cheer.
Yet there are books with magic fraught
O'er all life's finer springs,
That sway the hearts and lives of men
As winds sway lesser things.
Fly days and nights beneath their spell
As sprows through the air,
And men, as on angelic wings,
Regain "the mansions fair."

Though charmless thou, I hold thee dear;
And, as I gaze on thee,
I know thy words are moving fast
In thousands livingly.
They glow within the lover's speech
As burned the vestal flame;
And in the Poet's lofty strain,
That wakes the deathless fame;
In Sorrow's wail, in Want's lone prayer,
In penitence sincere,
In all that soul to soul reveals,
Thy words of life appear.

This hour, as 'neath the castle's wall
I hear the echoing winds,
Thy words in myriad uses serve
Ten thousand hearts and minds.
Ten thousand pens are using thee
In wisdom, letter, verse;
In happiness, in misery,
In better and in worse -
Heidelberg, Dec. 22, 1855.

In all that mortal natures feel
Of hope, of joy, of care,
When on the earth they reverent kneel.
Offering holy prayer,
Or when in musings dark within,
Unsaid to those about,
Thy words are living servants all
We ne'er could do without.

Thou art the book of human life,
The sum of all we know;
Ten thousand ages in thee meet,
And in thy meanings flow.
Man's many-sided nature has
Through many eras passed,
His knowledge and his history
In words are fully glassed;
Each word that stands upon thy page
Is record true of man,
Of that which in the world he found,
Or in his being ran;
Had Virtue ne'er been in the world,
Nor Beauty in the morn,
These words we ever prize so dear
Had ne'er themselves been born.*

As elements in Nature few
Compose the boundless whole,
And take their countless forms of life
In Order's nice control,
So Man thy words, in myriad ways,
Doth well in use combine,
And through the form each gives to thee
His quality doth shine.
The wise, the fool, the good, the base,
All use thee as they will;
But thou, in ways unknown to them,
Takest their likeness still.
Dull book! I view thee evermore
As monument of man,
To mark the progress he has made,
As Time his cycles ran;
Both Mind and Nature hold the laws
Which e'er all language sway;
These, must, throughout creation's range,
All human speech obey.

* It has for many years been a theory of the author that, as realities preceded the ideas and words relating to them, the existence of the words, in all languages, is owing to the reality of the things. Words of superstition are no objection to the view taken, as they name ideas falsely founded, or misapprehensions of reality. Hence the noblest words and the meanest are proofs of what has ever been in human consciousness and experience; the former carrying in their very import the approval of the human heart, and the latter its condemnation. There is not, and cannot be, anything truer, nobler, or holier in human language than has previously appeared in the inner life and general experience of man.

GIGANTIC PROJECT.—BRIDGE FROM NEW YORK TO BROOKLYN.—Mr. J. J. Rink, a German architect of New York, has designed a plan for a bridge across the east river, connecting Broad-street, with Atlantic-street, Brooklyn. The length is to be 8273 feet, width 300 feet. There are to be six arches, and the height of the bridge, above high-water mark, is to be 140 feet. The arches are to be constructed so that the intervening spaces can be used for storing military stores, while the south front of the bridge will serve for a river fortification. The two abutments are to be pierced for a number of large cannon. On the north front the piers are to be turned into storehouses or hotels. The vaults of the interior are to be used as swimming-baths, slaughter-houses, markets, &c. The foundations of the piers are to be constructed upon a new and simple plan, involving but little expense. The formation of the bridge are designed for a custom-house, armoury, and a dépôt of military stores, to be connected with Governor's Island, by a submarine passage.

THE exhibition of paintings was opened on Monday in the Palais de l'Industrie, Paris.

"SCENE AT A GHAUT ON THE BANKS OF THE GANGES."—PAINTED BY M. CLAXTON.

FROM THE EXHIBITION OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

THE extreme strangeness, to European eyes, of many of the commonest scenes in India, which, though often poetical, awaken few sympathies or associations out of the country, or among minds unfamiliar with its manners and customs and its peculiar religious observances, is the sufficient reason why we seldom see a picture with such a subject as that we have engraved. Southey, in his best poetical work, "The Curse of Kehama," essayed in vain to interest us in the Hindoo mythology, which Sir Walter Scott justly terms "the most gigantic, cumbrous, and extravagant system of idolatry to which temples were ever erected." We think our readers, however, will feel with us that the incident Mr. Claxton has represented is touchingly beautiful and pathetic; and the accuracy of every detail may be relied on, for the artist has resided, we believe, many years in the country.

"Ghaut" is, properly, a chain of hills, or a pass among mountains; and, as the steps before us apparently lead up to a pagoda, it no doubt takes the name from its situation. We quote, however, the following "Extract from Journal" which Mr. Claxton gives in explanation of his work:—"I took a boat and went up the river again to the Ghaut. As we came up a number of natives hurried down the steps, carrying a woman. They put the bamboo couch into the river, and some women poured water over her face and head, and scattered flowers about her. The Hindoos believe they have secured the happiness of their friends if they put them into the Holy River before they die." The light tint of the complexion of the dying maiden compared to the attendants, or coolies, who bear her, or to the low-caste woman, with her silver armlets, on the right, and even to her sympathising relatives, proves her to be of high caste. Our readers are aware of the numerous superstitious practices connected with the bathing and deification of the Ganges, and which the Hindoo Brahminical aristocracy have found it to their interest to insist upon the observance of from the remotest antiquity. A large proportion of the swarming inhabitants of its fertile valley perform very frequent—if not morning and evening—ablutions in its waters; and bear away, as we see several of the figures in the picture prepared to do, a portion in earthen jars. Quantities, indeed, of the water are carried to all parts of India, and sworn by in courts of justice. The ceremony of the picture, besides the others we have mentioned, that of the Brahmuns and other Hindoos throwing lighted tapers towards sunset into the broad bright stream which "sweeps by them, guiltless of their impiety and unconscious of their homage," are all comparatively innocent, and some of the observances are highly beneficial to the inhabitants, as well as very graceful in fancy; but the people are to the last degree cruel and heathenish. Many, especially females, commit suicide by sinking themselves at the particularly-sacred spot where the streams of the Ganges and Jumna unite. Children were sacrificed by being thrown into the river, before the British Govvernment interfered. Many poor expiring creatures are not rescued, like the woman in our Engraving, but left with their bodies half in the water and half out, till the rising tide overwhelms them. Many are laid where the tide cannot reach them, and their case is more pitiable still. Beneath a burning sun they are left without food; and many of them who would very probably recover from their diseases, if proper attention were paid to them, are literally starved to death or devoured by jackals at night.

On the left, below the bungalow, there is another but more assured victim of Siva the Destroyer. And, as if to pay homage to their favourite deity, they have made the funereal pile an altar to complete the destruction which natural decay would soon effect in such a climate. Happily another life is not involved since the abolition of the horrible suttee. Lepers, being regarded as objects of Divine wrath, have been sometimes burned alive.

Mr. Claxton's picture is very effective and correct in composition, and rich, yet harmonious, in colour.

"SKETCHING FROM NATURE."

PAINTED BY W. HEMSLEY.

FROM THE EXHIBITION OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

A VERY pleasant life is that of the wandering artist. We do not much care for the "artist at home," although Mr. Thackeray has given us, in "The Newcomes," such a charming sketch of him; and, making some pretensions to be one ourselves, a scene in an artist's studio, which to the public is like a peep behind the curtain, is to us merely a sniff of the shop. But "the artist abroad" is altogether a gloriously exceptional and heroic character. He is then true to his nature, for he is now quite fashionable to consider the "vagabond" instinct a part of the lazy artistic temperament. It is a great mistake to suppose that the English people generally have no Carnival, for, the moment a true Briton sets out for a tour, or even an excursion, he does nothing but masquerade. But what is this to the far greater privileges of an artist on a sketching expedition? That is, indeed, one uninterrupted Carnival. For who can masquerade like he; with velvet manteau, slouched Italian hat, and a thousand other disguises; not to mention the normal profusion of the hair of his head, and the hirsute appendages of his face, which he can arrange and wear in every conceivable fashion; whether originally adopted by Assyrian, antique (an artist knows nothing since Greeks and Romans), mediæval, or old master? Who, also, is so little amenable to public opinion, and yet so great an object of curiosity? And, above all, who is so free? He carries all his professional necessaries under his arm; and he has no rent or taxes to pay—not that he contributes a very large sum at any time to the Exchequer, even including Income-tax. Then, always having a sociable turn, and—notwithstanding his shaggy, ferocious looks—being by no means a savage animal, he generally makes friends wherever he goes. He never looks rich, so he finds favour with the humblest; but he needs not dot his wide-awake to the proudest. And—especially since the return of the Crimean heroes his wild looks do not (as we see in the picture we have engraved) frighten all the children, and set all the babies crying.

Let us not be misunderstood, however; we would not hint for a moment anything personal in respect to Mr. Hemsley—for we suppose that is the gentleman himself seated sketching before us. On the contrary, we freely admit that his trim is highly respectable, and we do not even suspect him to have slightly modified his actual appearance on the occasion represented, and to have given himself a slight polish, in order to be properly presentable to his anticipated patron—fair or otherwise. We may, indeed, assure Mr. Hemsley that we never saw him look so well (on the walls of the Academy); that his appearance is altogether satisfactory and, strange compliment, highly amusing.

Seriously, however—if we can be serious before such a droll face (we mean the boy's)—we have never seen a more perfect realisation of the expression intended than is caught in the whole figure the artist is "sketching" from. Extreme vanity and impudence are combined with awkward bashfulness as unmistakable even in this boy, as in many a legitimate portrait and in most photographs, especially those which amuse idle pedestrians at shop doors. The young urchin, who is mischievously trying to make the artist's cat just laugh [illegible] recommending him, behind his hand, above all things not to [illegible] or remarking that it is "a pity he does not paint [illegible] making some other equally irrelevant observation; the other boys overlook the artist's pert lie behind his back; and the many other amusing points of this excellently-painted picture, we leave to our readers' sense of the humorous.

"HIGHLAND SPORTS: DEER-STALKING SCENE."—PAINTED BY T. W. BOTTOMLEY.—FROM THE EXHIBITION OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

THE great amount of tact, knowledge, skill, and patience required to be a successful hunter of the red deer of Scotland may well excuse the stalwart Highlander in philibeg and bonnet in our Engraving contemplating with evident satisfaction his conquest of that noble hart. The sport must always rank among the very first of those not attended with imminent personal danger; and the man who can knock over a stag would, probably, generally have sufficient self control and courage to face, like Gordon Cumming, the more dangerous animals of chase. The gillies, also, are plainly securing the deer with hearty good will on the sturdy Shetland pony, and the great Highland greyhounds share the exultation of the triumph. From the antlers of the stag being thrown back we cannot very well make out the number of points he reckons; and, though the beam is majestic, we do not see here, or in the hoof and other parts, the same disposition to idealise the red deer (the stags not the hinds), which often leads Sir Edwin Landseer almost too far from nature. This animal appears, however, to have the "brow," "bray," and "tray" antlers, but not a developed crown.

We regret that Mr. Bottomley s picture has not secured a more favourable position on the walls of the Academy, especially as he is undoubtedly a very promising artist. In our notice of the Exhibition of the British Institution we called attention to another excellent picture by Mr. Bottomley, where it can be fairly viewed; and we are confident that all who have seen that work will regret their inability to see that which we have engraved equally well. We are slow to attribute any blame to the Hanging Committee, for their task is to the last degree difficult, tedious, and thankless; but when will these injuries to defenceless, struggling men cease to be inflicted through the miserable inadequacy of the rooms for the fair exhibition of the enormously-increased and increasing number of contributions from all the artists of the nation, to say nothing of the hundreds of works rejected?

"BLACKBERRY DELL."

PAINTED BY H. JUTSUM.

FROM THE EXHIBITION OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

It is a very trite observation that we often gain more when we stoop than when we soar—that we can pick up the gem or pluck the flower at our feet, though we may not reach the star; and the Hanging Committee at the Royal Academy seems to have, this year, determined to furnish an illustration of the remark in the collocation of the pictures. Artists themselves must prefer to be sunk to the very lowest depth below "the line" or plummet to being condemned to suffer the fate of Haman, or receive an apotheosis before death, and be lost to mortal ken above the clouds (of dust) of this restless, struggling, sight-seeing, nether world. A large number (we ascertained at occasional intervals permitted by the absence of crinoline) of excellent pictures, especially of landscapes, are certainly on the floor. Many of these are distinguished by their close study of nature in a kind of intense Tennysonian spirit, and some seem painted with that stark distinctness which fever lends the vision, and in rivalry with photography; these forming the "spasmodic" school of painting. We have, however, chosen a very different picture for our Engraving. We do not mean that this unpretending, modest little work is deficient in detail, for any one who is not too tall to stoop without loss of dignity at the Academy to what we believe carpenters call the "skirting" of the rooms will find, on comparing it with the others in a like situation, that it has very nearly the same amount of close imitation, but that there is no appearance of labour; and you contemplate it with precisely the quiet gratification which you would derive from the scene itself, if you sought shelter from the sun in such a dell or dingle some pensive summer's noon, and had Thomson as a companion. Our readers will not fail, of course, to appreciate its quiet feeling and manifest love of nature; and we need only remind them that the poet has described just such a sequestered spot, with its shady, cool, transparent brook flowing so gently from its secret runnel under the bushes, and between the boulders, where it makes a little plash and babble. The sentiment, too, is carried on so nicely in the composition—it is so natural and unstudied—with its rough growth of coltsfoot, rank grass, and ferns in the foreground; and the chequered path by the graceful stems of the birches, with the tangle of brambles at their feet, on the one side, balanced by the bank, or—to avoid words which might cause commercial recollections to intrude in such a rustic scene—supported by the slope, the young saplings, &c., on the other side of the little impenetrable vista.

"OLD BRIDGE AT DOLWYDDELAN."

PAINTED BY J. J. JENKINS

FROM THE EXHIBITION OF THE SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER-COLOURS.

MR. JENKINS has very considerably varied his choice of subject by painting the wild scene we have engraved. It does not possess the pathetic human interest of some of his more recent works; but that crazy old bridge, of such primitive construction, the stream chafing in its rugged bed, and the rocky barrage beyond, are well worth painting for their novelty, and give us, as a water-colour drawing, quite a new sensation. Not but that we feel some compassion for the poor Welsh family upon whom in another instant the approaching, rather than impending, shower will burst, and drench even the unfortunate David-ap-Llewellyn, despite his heroic great-coat, besides preventing the anxious young Thomas-ap-David-ap-Llewellyn getting the animals he has charge of to their destination in ease and comfort.

Fine scenes in North Wales, without being of mountainous character, are more rugged and wild than that stretch of moorland beyond the bridge. Dolwyddelan being also not far from Mount Shabod and the great chain which intersects Caernarvonshire, and includes Snowdon, Mr. Jenkins has very correctly represented the approaching cloud with the meteorological character of mountainous districts. The wreaths of mist and piles of rain-cloud, which form and collect in elevated regions, being forced downwards by sudden gusts of wind, sweep suddenly and unexpectedly over the more level land, but still preserve their edges perfectly defined, and often rise in their rapid course near from the ground like a gigantic wall capped with threatening battlements, whence "heaven's artillery" often flashes and thunders forth. The contents of the cloud in the picture will soon quicken the pace of the stream into a torrent, as it rushes on its tortuous way over the moor, and dashes through the bridge till it loses its energy in the volume of the Conway. Altogether this is such a peculiar and original scene to paint, that we should suspect the idea of representing it came into the artist's mind shortly after he had had a nap upon the neighbouring summit of Snowdon; for, according to the ancient Britons, who ever slept upon the sacred mountain, awoke inspired. The village of Dolwyddelan consists of only a few small cottages; and very trifling relics now serve to mark the site of the former strength and grandeur of the ancient Castle of Dolwyddelan. It was a fortress of very considerable importance to the Welsh; and recent investigations render it probable that this was the last stronghold in North Wales that held out against Edward I.

"LOVE LIGHTENS LABOUR."

PAINTED BY J. H. MOLE.

FROM THE EXHIBITION OF THE NEW SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER-COLOURS.

"LOVE Lightens Labour" must be a self-evident proposition to any but a hopelessly-confirmed and irreparably-dilapidated musty old bachelor, or an equally frowsy and irreclaimable old maid, who has finally given up in despair the manufacture of worked slippers. Mr. Mole need not, however, have given us a brawny Highlander and that robust lassie to illustrate the fact. Any kind of labour is lightened by such a blessed influence, and the sweat of the brain fanned away as well as the sweat of the brow. Indeed, the absence of love limits the exercise of the mind far more than the powers of the body; and, although Hercules would probably have got through his labours in half the unconscionable time he took, if he had had such a stimulus, we are certain that we should have been occupied four times as long in painfully producing these poor passages if we had not had—to whisper a confession, gentle reader some such incitement. We are on dangerous ground, however, and hasten back to the kilted man of thews and sinews. Now, such a basketful of wet peat is a monstrously heavy thing to carry, and would require rather more strength to lift into the cart than generally falls to the share of a chevalier de la plume. Still we think we should, under similar circumstances, have chivalrously attempted to do it. Upon the first impression we received, from the action and situation of the figures, we confess that we entertained some injurious suspicions of Johnny Scot being a thorough gentleman. We thought the artist intended that he should be understood to be a sly fellow, d'ye see, who merely lends a hand to one side of the basket for the purpose of enjoying a little chat and banter. We endeavoured, however, to invest the action with as much romance as possible, especially upon observing that he takes the considerable lower side, and that if they carry the burden between them to the cart their relative positions will remain the same, and Johnny consequently bear by far the greater portion of the weight. Still we felt some little reservation, which, upon reflection, we have no doubt was completely unjustifiable; for Mr. Mole, in all probability, knows the worthy Scot to be a model of knighthood, sans peur et sans reproche, and that he is about to swing the basket on to his own shoulders, and of course he—or rather the aforesaid "love" —will make light of it; and the highly-gratified smile of the bonnie lassie herself seems to intimate that she is no stranger to the illusion. The little "make-believe" peat fire is ignited, we suppose, to try its properties as fuel; for between the "love" and the "labour" this happy couple must surely be sufficiently warm.

Mr. Mole's picture is very full and complete in effect, and natural in colour. The Highlander, especially, is painted with great power; and, as is always observable in the works of this artist, the landscape accessories are equal to the figures.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

VISCOUNTESS GAGE.

THE RIGHT HON. ELIZABETH MARIA VISCOUNTESS GAGE died of apoplexy on the 13th inst. This lamented lady was the eldest daughter of the late Hon. Edward Foley, and the granddaughter of Thomas, first Lord Foley, and was born in 1793. Her Ladyship was married in the March, 1813, to Henry Hall, fourth and present Viscount Gage, by whom she leaves issue two sons, both married, and four daughters, of whom two are married—viz., the Hon. Mrs. Prendergast Vereker, and Mrs. Tomline.

THE HON. MRS. DAWSON DAMER.

THIS lady, who died on the 12th inst., after a short illness, was Eliza, the daughter of Captain Edmund Joshua Moriarty, R.N., by his wife, the Lady Lucy Luttrell, daughter of Simon, first Earl of Carhampton. She was married the 20th May, 1813, to Captain the Hon. Henry Dawson Damer, by whom (who died the 27th May, 1841) she leaves one son, Henry John Reuben, third and present Earl of Portarlington, and three daughters—viz., Mrs. King, Mrs. De Luttrell-Saunderson, and Mrs. Knox.

LIEUT.-GEN. SIR WILLIAM LEWIS HERRIES, C.B., K.C.H.

THIS distinguished officer, who devoted almost the whole of a long life to the military and civil service of his country, died on the 3rd inst. Sir William Lewis Herries was the second son of Colonel Herries, and the younger brother of the Right Hon. John Charles Herries. He was born at Amiens in 1785, and entered the British Army in 1801. In September, 1806, he accompanied the 9th Dragoons to South America. He acted as a Brigade-Major in the expedition against Buenos Ayres; and in 1809 he was in the Walcheren attempt, and at the Siege of Flushing. Herries was afterwards in the Peninsular War, and was present at the Battle of Vittoria, the Siege of San Sebastian, and the Passage of the Bidassoa. On the 14th of April, 1814, at the famous sortie from Bayonne, Herries, then on the general staff, was wounded by a ball in the knee, while endeavouring, with Major-General Moore, to free Sir John Hope from his horse, which had been shot under him. Herries, Moore, and Hope were all three taken prisoners, and Herries had his leg amputated the next morning. This event closed his active military career. He afterwards was successively Quartermaster-General in the Ionian Islands, Comptroller of Army Accounts, and Commissioner and Chairman of the Board of Audit. On his retirement from this last office, in 1854, he was appointed Colonel of the 68th Regiment. He was knighted and made a K.C.H. in 1826, and a C.B. in 1838. Sir William Herries married, the 4th December, 1828, Mary Frances, second daughter of Joshua Crompton, Esq., and sister of William Rooks Crompton Standsfield, Esq., of Esholt Hall, Yorkshire, by whom he has had two sons.

LIEUT.-COLONEL THOMAS BEST JERVIS.

LIEUT.-COLONEL THOMAS BEST JERVIS, of the Corps of Engineers, in the Bombay Presidency, and more recently the Founder and Director of the Topographical and Statistical Dépôt, was the second son of the Lieut.-Governor (Jervis) of Ceylon, and was the first cousin of the late Sir John Jervis, Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas. He was born at Jaffnapatam, in Ceylon, in 1796, and was educated at Addiscombe. He entered the East India Company's military service on the 6th of October, 1812, and ably and zealously fulfilled the duties of his profession until 1842, when he retired from India and returned to England, where he occupied himself continually in geographical researches, chiefly with a view to the furtherance of missionary labours, until the commencement of the recent war with Russia. Colonel Jervis, seeing at that time the great need in which the country stood of a Topographical and Statistical Dépôt, with which all the other European states were furnished, concentrated all his resources, and all the information he had amassed by many years of study, and energetically and successfully set about the establishment and organisation of the office, of which he was finally nominated director by the Duke of Newcastle in 1854. The fatigue and responsibility, however, proved too much for his enfeebled frame, and he terminated a career of unremitting usefulness and activity in the full discharge of his laborious duties as chief of his office, on the 3rd of April, 1857.

Lieut.-Col. Jervis's three brothers have also been in the East India Company's service—the elder two in the Corps of Engineers, and the younger in the Artillery; and they have severally received the highest testimonials of distinction from the Government and their immediate commanders.

Lieut.-Colonel Best Jervis wrote many papers on India, amongst which were a Report on the Weights and Measures of Southern India, and a work on Indian Meteorology; but his most remarkable production was his book entitled "Records of Ancient Science," in which he proved that all weights and measures were derived from one original standard, made known to Solomon at the building of the temple.

REAR-ADMIRAL D. H. O'BRIEN.

REAR-ADMIRAL DONATUS HENCHY O'BRIEN died on the 13th ult. at his seat in Hertfordshire. The gallant officer had actively distinguished himself in the British Navy. He was Midshipman of the Overyssel, and commanded a flat-bottomed boat at the expedition to the Helder in 1799. He was made prisoner when wrecked in the Hussar, and, after undergoing many hardships, he succeeded in effecting his escape. He was a Lieutenant of the Warrior, at the taking of Zante, Cephalonia, and the other Ionian Islands, and he was afterwards in numerous actions of note during the whole French war. He had received the naval war medal and four clasps, and had also a pecuniary reward from the Patriotic Fund. He became Rear-Admiral the 8th of March, 1852.

C. E. RUMBOLD, ESQ.

CHARLES EDMUND RUMBOLD, Esq., of Preston Candover, Hants, who dien on the 31st ult., Rumbold residence, 6, Percival-terrace, Brighton, was the son of Sir Thomas Rumbold, Bart., Governor of Madras, M.P. for Shoreham, by his wife Johanna, daughter of Dr. Law, Bishop of Carlisle. Mr. Rumbold married Harriet, daughter of John Gardner, Esq., of Ashford, Kent, by whom he has left three sons: Charles Augustus, Thomas Henry, and Henry Edmund William. He was, with the exception of a few short intervals, M.P. for Yarmouth from 1818 till 1837, when, after the last Parliament, he retired on account of declining health. The Rumbold baronets spring from Mr. Rumbold's grandfather, Governor Rumbold, of Goa, who died second in Council at Tilliseberry, and who descended from a brother of William Rumbold, Esq., of Parson's-green, Fulham, Comptroller of the Great Wardrobe, and Surveyor-General of all the Customs of England, temp. Charles II. Another brother of this William Rumbold was the celebrated republican, Colonel Richard Rumbold of the historic Rye House, Herts, who claimed descent from a Rumbold, Chancellor, temp. Edward the Confessor.

WILLIAM HAMMOND, ESQ.

THIS highly-respected gentleman, of Camden-road Villas and Scott's-yard, London, and Exning-grove, Suffolk, died at Hastings, on the 2nd inst., in his 63rd year. The deceased was one of her Majesty's justices of the peace for the county of Middlesex, and on the grand juries for the counties of Suffolk and Cambridge. He was for many years the head of a highly-respected London firm, connected with the India and China trade, and representing a business of upwards of seventy years' standing. Mr. Hammond was, on the maternal side, one of the last lineal descendants of Shakspeare.

THE REV. MR HUNTLEY.

THE REV. RICHARD WEBSTER HUNTLEY, A.M., of Boxwell Court, Gloucestershire, was the head of the ancient family of Huntley of Boxwell and Standish, and the eldest son of the Rev. Richard Huntley, A.M., and was born on the 2nd of April, 1793. He succeeded to the possession of the Boxwell property upon the demise of his father, the 16th of October, 1831. He had been a Fellow of All Souls College, Oxford, had served the office of Proctor for that University in 1825, and was distinguished for his literary, antiquarian, and genealogical acquirements. He was, through his mother, the direct representative of the celebrated Bishop Warburton. His paternal family can be traced in England from the time of the Conqueror, under whom his ancestors held grants in the parish of Huntley, in Gloucestershire. The rev. gentleman was highly esteemed in Gloucestershire for his integrity and benevolence, and for his constant attention to his magisterial and clerical duties. He married, on the 8th of July, 1830, Mary, eldest daughter of Richard Lyster, Esq., and sister of Henry Lyster, Esq., of Wroughton Castle, Shropshire, and has had issue two sons and two daughters. The Rev. Mr. Huntley died on the 6th ult., and is succeeded by his elder son, Richard Freville Huntley, who was born on the 15th of December, 1833.

THOMAS LEGH, ESQ.

THOMAS LEGH, Esq., of Lyme Park, in the county of Chester, and of Haydock Lodge and Golborne Park, in the county of Lancaster, who died on the 8th ult., at Milford Lodge, Lymington, Hants, in the sixty-fifth year of his age, was in early life well known as a distinguished traveller. Mr. Legh being left when very young the inheritor of the large estate of Lyme, no sooner finished his curriculum at Oxford than he went on a voyage to Greece and Albania, whence he extended his researches to Egypt and Nubia. Early in his travels Mr. Legh was at Zante to witness the arrival of the celebrated frieze discovered in the Temple of Apollo at Phigalia. In the excavation and removal of the beautiful sculptures composing that frieze, now one of the chief ornaments of the British Museum, Mr. Legh was largely instrumental both by his purse and his active personal exertions. A complete set of casts of these sculptures adorn the corridor of Mr. Legh's mansion at Lyme. Mr. Legh published an account of his subsequent journey in Egypt, and the country beyond the Cataracts. Mr. Legh, happening to be at Brussels on the eve of the Battle of Waterloo, offered himself as a volunteer, and served as an extra Aide-de-Camp to the Duke of Wallington during the whole of the memorable engagement. He travelled also much afterwards. From 1819 to 1831 Mr. Legh represented his own borough of Newton in Parliament. The various treasures of art and of antiquity that Mr. Legh collected in his travels he deposited, with some occasional additions, in the fine ancestral mansion at Lyme—one of the noblest edifices in England. Whether he were at home or otherwise, Mr. Legh allowed this house to be at all times visible. His park, interesting for its wild scenery, and its herds of wild cattle and of red and fallow deer, was also always open. Mr. Legh was a magistrate and Deputy Lieutenant for the counties of Lancaster and Chester, LL.D., and F.R.S. He married, first, Ellen, daughter of William Turner, Esq., of Shrigley Hall M.P. for Blackburn (the Miss Turner the innocent subject of the old trial), by whom, who died in 1831, he leaves an only daughter, Ellen Jane now Mrs Lowther. He married, secondly Maud Fourth daughter of G Lowther, Esq., of Hampten Hall, Somersetshire, who survives him. He is succeeded in his large estates by William Legh Esq., now of Lyme.

MR. HENSLOWE.

EDWARD PRENTIS HENSLOWE, Esq., was the youngest child of the late Sir John Henslowe, Chief Surveyor of the Royal Navy, and was born in London on the 30th August, 1772. His life was one of singular vicissitude. He was educated at Chudleigh, in Devonshire, and sailed with Sir John Jervis, afterwards Lord St. Vincent, as a Midshipman. He soon after left the service of the Royal Dockyard, Chatham; but, on losing that appointment through the treachery of a false friend, who subsequently perished at sea, he, under the patronage of William Henry Duke of Gloucester and the Prime Minister, Mr. Pitt, obtained a commission as Paymaster and Captain in the 90th Regiment, with which he served in Ireland. Exchanging into the 15th Light Dragoons (King's Hussars), he shared in the hardships and fame of the Corunna campaign, under Sir John Moore; and he, in consequence, received the Peninsular war medal forty years later. At the close of the war, in 1815, he became successively Paymaster to the Invalid Dépôts at Canterbury, and at Fort Pitt, Chatham. After a temporary residence in France, he lived with his third son, the Rev. William Henry Henslowe, at his parsonage at Tilbury, in Essex; and, finally, at Tottenhill, in Norfolk. In 1852 he retired, with his wife and daughter, to the Northfleet College, in Kent, where he died on the 15th ult.

NEW SCHOOLS AT MALVERN.

THE foundation-stone of these schools was laid on the 3rd inst., with Masonic ceremony. A general holiday was kept at Malvern, and the whole population seemed as if collected to witness the procession of the Freemasons from their lodge, which had been established for the day at the Abbey boarding-house. Obedient to the summons of the Right Worshipful H. C. Vernon, Grand Master Mason of the Province, nearly eighty members of the craft assembled to assist in the ceremonial, which, on this occasion, presented a curious and novel feature. The stone was laid not only by the Grand Master Mason, assisted by the proper grand officers of the craft, but also by Lady Emily Foley, instructed by the Grand Master; and, says the Worcester Herald, "the Grand Master had an apt pupil in his fair élève, who handled the trowel and applied the level, plumb, and line like an experienced craftswoman." Lady Foley, who is lady of the manor, presented a site for the buildings and sufficient ground for other purposes. The Vicar has collected £1789 for the great object, which, together with a liberal allowance of £1284, from the Government, and the free site from Lady Foley, enabled the work to be commenced with the certainty that the pecuniary means are provided for its completion. The site commands a good view of the Malvern range of hills. The style of the building is Gothic; the architect is Mr. E. W. Elmslie, of Malvern. The trowel used used on this interesting occasion by Lady Emily Foley is a good specimen of ornamental silver-work. it was supplied by the Messrs. Manning, silversmiths, of Worcester and Malvern. It contains the following inscription in Gothic characters, incised round the implement as a border:—"Parochial Schools, Great Malvern. First stone laid by Lady Emily Foley, June 3, 1857." We have engraved the Trowel above.

former, in the enemy's camp at Inkermann, and one of rounded by Russian cavalry, by his gallant conduct in rallying up to the rescue and cutting off the head of one Russian, disabling and dispersing the others.

4TH LIGHT DRAGOONS.—Private Samuel Parkes: In the charge of the Light Cavalry Brigade at Balaclava Trumpet-Major Crawford's horse fell, and dismounted him, and he lost his sword; he was attacked by two Cossacks, when Private Samuel Parkes (whose horse had been shot) saved his life by placing himself between them and the Trumpet-Major, and cut them away by his sword. In attempting to follow the Light Brigade, he was attacked and retreated therefrom by six Russians, whom Parkes kept at bay, and retired slowly, fighting, and defending the [illegible] Major for some time until deprived of his sword by a shot.

[illegible] Lieutenant Alexander Robert Dun-

[illegible] ary For defending the guns of his battery against [illegible] of the enemy at the battle of Inkermann, on which occasion [illegible] he had received twelve bayonet wounds. He was attached to the Separate Brigade at Varna, Second Division.

ROYAL ENGINEERS. Brevet Lieut.-Col Matthew Charles Dixon: On the 17th April, 1855, about two p.m., when the battery he commanded was blown up by a shell from the enemy, which burst in the magazine, destroyed the platform on which he commanded ten men, disabled two guns and covered a sixth with earth, for most gallantly reopening fire with the remaining gun before the enemy had ceased cheering from their parapets on which they had mounted, and fighting it single-handed and covered a sixth with earth, for most gallantly reopening fire with the remaining gun before the enemy had ceased cheering from their parapets on which they had mounted, and fighting it single-handed and the heavy concentrated fire of the enemy's batteries, and the ruined state of his own.—Gunner and Driver Thomas Arcuer: When in charge of [illegible] one of the left advanced batteries of the right attack, on [illegible] and 6 Quarries were taken, he of his own accord carried [illegible] ition for the 5th Fusiliers several times during the [illegible] evening across the open ground for and formed one of the spiking party of Artillery at the assault on the Redan on June 18, 1855.

ROYAL ENGINEERS.—Lieut. Gerald Graham: Determined gallantry at the head of a ladder party, at the assault of the Redan on June 18, 1855. On cool heroism in rallying out of the trenches on numerous occasions, and bringing in wounded officers and men.—Lieut. D. Lennox: Cool and gallant conduct in establishing a lodgment in Tryon's Rifle-pit, and [illegible] Russians so [illegible]. Handkerchief [illegible] Also distinguished conduct on July 24, 1855, in connecting the fourth parallel right attack with the Russian rifle-pit in front. Extremely [illegible] conduct on August 23, 1855, in favor of the advance from the fourth parallel right attack on the Redan, in placing and filling twenty five gabions under a heavy fire, while annoyed by the presence of light bodies. Intrepid and devoted conduct in creeping to the Redan in the night of September 8, 1855, and reporting its evacuation, on which its occupation by the English took place.—Lieut. Reginald Lendrim: Intrepidity in getting on the top of a magazine and extinguishing sandbags which were burning, and making good the breach under fire, on the 11th of April, 1855. For courage and presence of mind in repulsing 150 French Chasseurs, on the 14th of February, 1855, in building No. 9 battery, Left Attack, and replacing the whole of the sandbags on the embrasures under a heavy fire. Was [illegible] ceding the sailors with [illegible] ming of the Redan, on the 18th of June, 1855: [illegible] that day. [illegible] Major Peel, Bart:
[illegible] sentinels from [illegible]
[illegible] Sergeant Norman, Privates Anthony Palmer and [illegible] volunteered the first. Distinguished conduct
[illegible] Present when the charge was made in defence
[illegible] upon the enemy, as witnessed by [illegible] and Sir C. Russell's Life.—Sergeant [illegible] seized a shell which fell in the centre of a number of ammunition cases and powder, and threw it outside the trench, it burst as it touched the ground.

COLDSTREAM GUARDS.—Brevet Major Gerald Littlehales Goodlake: [illegible] e in command of the sharpshooters fur-
[illegible] on Quarries, on the
[illegible] Division," when he held the Windmill [illegible] ense, against a much larger force of the enemy. The party of sharpshooters then under his command killed thirty-eight, one an officer, and took three prisoners of the enemy of the latter one an officer. Major Goodlake being the sole officer in command. Also for distinguished gallantry on the occasion of the surprise of a picket of the enemy, in November, at the bottom of the Windmill Ravine, by the sharpshooters, under his zeal in leading and command, when the sharpshooters of the enemy's party fell into his hands.—Lieut. William Stanlock: For having volunteered, when employed as one of the sharpshooters, in October, 1854, for reconnoitring purposes, to crawl up within 150 yards of a Russian rifle-pit, and having actually reached when command to effect a surprise.—Private George Strong: For having, when on duty in the trenches in the month of September, 1855, removed a live shell from the place where it had fallen.

SCOTS FUSILIER GUARDS.—Brevet Major Robert James Lindsay: When the formation of the line of the regiment was disordered at Alma, Captain Lindsay stood firm with the colours, and by his example greatly tended to restore order. At Inkerman, at a most trying moment, he, with a few men, charged a party of Russians, driving them back, and rescuing one [illegible] his body.—Sergeant Alexander Reddine and Private William Reynolds: When the colour of the regiment was disordered at Alma, for having behaved gallantly and rallied the men round the colours.

2ND BATTALION 1ST REGIMENT.—Private John Prosser: On the 16th of June, 1855, when on duty on the trenches before Sebastopol, for parrying and [illegible] Russian coming across to two cross fires a soldier in the act of deserting to the enemy. On the 11th of August 1855, before Sebastopol, for having the most advanced trench under a heavy fire, and assisting to carry in a soldier of the 95th Regiment, who lay severely wounded.

3RD REGIMENT. Brevet Lieut.-Colonel Frederick Francis Maude: For most distinguished bravery on the night 8, 9th, when in command of the covering [illegible] of the Second Division on the assault of the Redan, to which he gallantly [illegible] his men. Having entered the Redan, he, with only nine or ten men, made a personal reconnaissance, and finding the enemy in full force, and no hope of support was at an end, himself dangerously wounded.—Private John Connors: Distinguished himself most conspicuously at the assault on the Redan, on the 8th of September, 1855, on several occasions, rescued an officer of the 30th Regiment, who was surrounded by Russians, by shooting one and bayoneting another; and was observed inside the Redan in command of a party of the Regiment for some time. Was selected by his company for the French War Medal.

7TH REGIMENT. Private Mathew Hughes: On June 7, 1855, at the [illegible] quarries, when ordered to carry ammunition, under a heavy fire, across the open ground, he also went to the front, and brought in Private John Hannon who was [illegible] severely wounded; and on June 18 1855, he volunteered to [illegible] Lieutenant Holden, 7th Royal Fusiliers, who was lying severely wounded, and in doing so was severely wounded himself.—Private Will am Norman: On the night of the 19th of December, 1854, he was placed on single sentry [illegible] distance in front of the advanced sentries of an outlying picket in the White Horse Ravine, in front of much danger, and requiring great vigilance. The Russian picket was posted about 300 yards in his front, three Russian soldiers advanced, under cover of the brushwood, for the purpose of reconnoitring. Private Will am Norman, single handed, took two of them prisoners without alarming the Russian picket.

8TH REGIMENT (LATE OF THE 90TH REGIMENT).—Ensign Andrew Moynihan: When sergeant, 90th Light Infantry, at the assault of the Redan, September 8, 1855: he personally encountered and killed five Russians. Assaulted from the rear the Redan wounded and severely.

17TH REGIMENT.—Corporal (Lance Sergeant) Philip Smith: For repeatedly going out in the front of the advanced trenches against the Great Redan, on June 18, 1855, under a very heavy fire, after the column had retired from the assault, and bringing in wounded comrades.

19TH REGIMENT.—Private John Lyons: For, on June 10, 1855, taking up a [illegible] which fell among the guard of the trenches, and throwing it over the parapet.

21ST REGIMENT.—Brevet Lieut.-Col Edward W. D. Bell: Recommended for his gallantry, more particularly at the battle of Alma, where he was the first to seize upon and capture one of the enemy's guns, which was timbered and being carried off. Also, moreover, he command of that gallant regiment, which he brought out his senior officers having been killed or wounded.—Lieut. O'Connor: Was one of the centre sergeants at the battle [illegible] anced between the officers carrying the colours. [illegible] ight, Lieutenant Anstruther, who was carrying a [illegible] wounded, and was shot in the breast at the same [illegible] recovering himself, snatched up the colour from the ground, and continued to carry it until the end of the action, although [illegible] by Captain Greville to relinquish it, and go to the rear, on account of his wound; was recommended for and received his commission for his services at Alma. Also behaved with great gallantry at the assault on the Redan, September 8, 1855, when he was shot through both thighs.

Corporal Robert Shields: For volunteering, on September 8, 1855, to go out to the front from the 5th parallel, after the attack on the Redan, to bring in Lieutenant Dyneley, who was wounded.

34TH REGIMENT.—Private William Coffey: For having, on March 29, 1855, thrown a lighted shell that fell into the trench over the parapet.—Private John J. Sims: For having, on June 18, 1855, after the regiment had retired into the trenches from the assault on the Redan, come out into the open ground, under a heavy fire, in broad daylight, and brought in wounded soldiers out side the trenches.

41ST REGIMENT.—Private Daniel Rowlands: For rescuing Colonel Haly, of the 47th Regiment, from R[illegible] soldiers. Colonel Haly having been wounded and surrounded by them, and for gallant exertions in holding the ground occupied by his advanced picket against the enemy at the commencement of the battle of Inkerman.—Sergeant-Major Ambrose Madden: For having headed a party of men of the 41st Regiment, and having cut off and taken prisoners one Russian officer and 14 privates, three of whom he himself captured.

47TH REGIMENT. Sergeant William M'Wheeney: Volunteered as sharpshooter at the commencement of the siege, and was in charge of the party of the 47th Regiment; was always vigilant and active, and signalised himself on October 20, 1854, when one of his party, Private John Keane, 47th Regiment, was dangerously wounded in the Woronzoff road. At the time the ambulance-carriers were repulsed from the Quarries by overwhelming numbers. Sergeant M'Wheeney, on his return, took the wounded man on his back and brought him to a place of safety under a very heavy fire. He was also the means of saving the life of Corporal Courtney. This man was severely wounded in the Quarries, December 4, 1854. Sergeant M'Wheeney went to him from under fire and dug up a shrub cover with his bayonet, where the two remained until dark, when they retired. Sergeant M'Weeney volunteered for the advanced guard of General Eyre's brigade, at the Cemetery, June 18, 1855; and was never absent from duty during the war.

47TH REGIMENT.—Private John M'Dermond: For savin the life of Colonel Daly, on the 5th of May, 1854, by his strong exertions in rushing up to his rescue when lying on the ground disabled and surrounded by a party of Russians, and killing the man who had disabled him.

49TH REGIMENT.—Sergeant George Walters: Highly distinguished himself at the battle of Inkerman. Having rescued Brigadier Colonel Adams, C.B., when surrounded by Russians, one of whom he bayonetted—[illegible] greatly distinguished himself. On [illegible] 1854 [illegible] counter with the Russians, and nobly assisted [illegible] Conolly, Coldstream Guards.

50TH REGIMENT.—Private Thomas Beach: For conspicuous gallantry at the battle of Inkerman, Nov. 5, 1854, when on picket in attacking several Russians who were plundering Lieutenant-Colonel Carpenter, 41st Regiment, who was lying wounded on the ground. He killed two of the Russians, and protected Lieutenant-Colonel Carpenter until the arrival of some men of the 41st Regiment.—Brevet Major Frederick C. Elton: For distinguished conduct on the night of Aug. 4, 1855, when in command of a working party in the advanced trenches in front of the Quarries, in encouraging and inciting his men by his example, to work under a dreadful fire; and when there was some hesitation shown on some occasions of the party of men, he rushed into the open and working with pick and shovel. In March, 1855, Major Elton volunteered, with a small party of men, to drive off a body of Russians who were destroying the new trenches during the night, and succeeded in doing so, taking prisoner one of the enemy with his own hands. On the night of June 7, 1855, Major Elton was the first of his party to leave our trenches leading his men, when in the Quarries he several times rallied his men around him.

57TH REGIMENT. Private Charles M'Corrie: On the night of the 23rd June, 1855 he threw over the parapet a live shell which had been thrown from the enemy's battery.

68TH REGIMENT.—Captain T. De Courcy Hamilton: For having, on the night of the 11th May, 1855, during a most determined sortie, boldly charged, and dispersed the enemy with a small force (thirty men), by which he had obtained possession in great numbers, thereby saving the works from falling into the hands of the enemy. Private John Byrne: At the battle of Inkerman, when the regiment was ordered to retire, [illegible] John Byrne went back towards the enemy, and, at risk of his life brought in a wounded soldier under fire. On May 11, 1855, he bravely engaged in a hand to hand contest with one of the enemy on the point of the work he was defending, preventing the entrance of the enemy, killed his antagonist, and captured his arms.

77TH REGIMENT. Sergeant John Peck: For conspicuous bravery at the battles of Alma and Inkerman. Highly distinguished himself at the taking of the Russian Rifle Pits on the night of the 19th April, 1855. He was severely wounded. Remarked for determined resolution on both attacks on the Redan.—Private Alexander Wright: For conspicuous bravery through the whole of the Crimean war. Highly distinguished on the night of 22nd March, 1855, in repulsing a sortie. He [illegible] of the guard at the taking of the Russian Rifle Pits, on the night of 19th April, 1855; remarked for the great encouragement he gave the men while holding the pits under a terrific fire. He was wounded. Highly distinguished on 30th Aug., 1855 when [illegible].

90TH REGIMENT.—Private John Alexander: After the attack on the Redan, 18th June, 1855, went out of the trenches under a very heavy fire, and brought in several wounded men. Also, when with a working party in the most advanced trench, 6th Sept., 1855, went out in front of the trenches, under a very heavy fire, and assisted in bring in Captain Barkley, Scots Fusilier Guards, lying dangerously wounded.

97TH REGIMENT. Brevet Major Charles Henry Lumley: For having distinguished himself highly by his bravery at the assault on the Redan, Sept 8, 1855 by engaging the first inside the work, where he was immediately engaged with five Russian gunners defending a gun, one of whom attacked him. He shot two of them with his revolver when he was knocked down by a stone, which stunned him for a moment, but on recovery he drew his sword, and, seeing the remaining three in the act of [illegible] he received a ball in his mouth, which wounded him most severely.—Sergeant John Coleman: Conspicuous for great coolness and bravery on the night of August 30th, 1855, when the enemy attacked the 7 pits and drove the working party in. He remained in the open, perfectly exposed to the enemy's rifle pits until all around him had been killed or wounded. He finally carried one of his officers, mortally wounded, to the rear.

1ST BATTALION RIFLE BRIGADE.—Brevet Major Hon. Henry H Clifford: For conspicuous gallantry at the battle of Inkerman, in leading a charge, and killing one of the enemy, disabling another, and saving the life of a soldier.—Captain William James Cuninghame and Brevet Major Claude Thomas Boutcher: Highly distinguished at the capture of the Rifle Pits, Nov. 26, 1854. Their gallant conduct recorded in the French General Orders.—Private F. Wheatley: For throwing a live shell over the parapet of the Redan.

2ND BATTALION RIFLE BRIGADE.—Lieut. John Knox: When serving as a sergeant in the Fusilier Guards. Lieutenant Knox was conspicuous for his exertions in re-forming the ranks of the Guards at the battle of Alma. Subsequently, when in the Rifle Brigade, he volunteered for the ladder party in the attack on the Redan on June 18, remaining on the field until twice wounded.—Private R. M'Gregor: For courageous conduct when employed as a sharpshooter in the advanced trenches in the month of July, 1855. A rifle pit was occupied by two Russians, who annoyed our troops by their fire. Private M'Gregor crossed the open space under fire, and, having come under a rock, disabled them, and occupied the pit.—Private Robert Hampston, and Private Joseph Bradshaw: Carried on daylight, April 22, 1855, a Russian rifle-pit, situated among the rocks overhanging the Woronzoff road, and occupied by the Russians at that attack and the quarries at that period in possession of the enemy. Private Hampston received a gratuity of £5, and was promoted. Private Bradshaw has since received the French War Medal.

ROYAL NAVY.—Commanders Cecil William Buckley, John Talbot Burgoyne, Gunner John Roberts: Landed in presence of a superior force and set fire to the Russian stores at Genitchi.—Lieutenant Cecil W. Buckley, also with Boatswain Henry Cooper, repeatedly landed in presence of a large force and fired the different stores and Government buildings at Fanagoria.—Lieut. Edward Hewett: Cut the hawser of the floating bridge in the Straits of Genitchi under a heavy fire of musketry, on which occasion he was wounded.—Boatswain Joseph Holloway: While boatswain of the Pylades in the Sea of Azoff, was taken prisoner after a stout resistance, while endeavouring to rescue Mr Odevaine, Mate.—Commander George Flott Day: With great enterprise and gallantry took a gunboat and crew, and effected a reconnaissance, within the enemy's lines at Genitchi, with the assistance of a pocket compass. After traversing four or five miles of low swampy ground, occasionally up to his knees in water.—Commander John Edmund Commerell, Quartermaster William Rickard: Crossed the Isthmus of Arabat, and, after fording two rivers, destroyed large quantities of forage on the Crimean shore of the Sivash, the rapid blazing of which alarmed a guard in the vicinity, who pursued them to the shore with a heavy fire of musketry, and very nearly succeeded in taking them prisoners.—Captain of the Mast George Ingouville: On July 12, 1855, while the boats of the Arrogant were engaged with the enemy's gun-boats and batteries off Viborg, her second cutter was swamped by a shell blowing up of her magazine, and drifted under a battery. Notwithstanding that he was wounded in the arm, and that the boat was under a very heavy fire, Ingouville, without any order to do so, jumped overboard, caught hold of her painter, and saved her.—Commander John Bythesea: Stoker William Johnstone: On Aug. 9, 1854, having ascertained that an Aide-de-Camp of the Emperor of Russia had landed on the island of Wardo, [illegible] a man and despatches for the Russian General, Commander Bythesea [illegible] armed permission for himself and William Johnstone [illegible] proceed on shore with the view to intercept them. Being supplied [illegible] with armed clothes concealed themselves in the night of the 12th, when the mail bags were landed close to the spot where they lay secreted in the bushes. The mails were accompanied by a military escort, which passed close to them, and which, as soon as it was ascertained the road was clear, took its departure. Commander Bythesea and the stoker then attacked the five men in charge of the mail, took three of them prisoners, and brought them in their own boat on board the Arrogant. The despatches were carried to General Baraguay d'Hilliers, who expressed himself in the highest terms of approval.—Charles D. Lucas, Lieutenant: This officer was promoted to his present rank on June 21, 1854, for his gallantry in throwing overboard a live shell at the first attack on the batteries of Bomarsund.

ROYAL MARINE BRIGADE (EMPLOYED ON SHORE).—Captain William Peel: [illegible] 18th of Oct., 1854, at the greatest possible risk, took up a live [illegible], the fuse still burning, from among several powder-cases out- [illegible] the trenches, and threw it over the parapet; the shell [illegible] (the words underlined, thereby saving the magazine and the lives [illegible] immediately round it. On Nov 6, 1854, at the battle of Inkerman, for joining the officers of the Grenadier Guards, and assisting in defending the colours of that regiment, when hard pressed by the enemy, at the Sandbag Battery. On the 18th of June, 1855, for volunteering to lead the ladder party at the assault on the Redan, and carrying the first ladder until wounded.—Midshipman Edward St. John Daniels: Answering a call for volunteers to bring in powder to the battery from a waggon in a very exposed position, under a destructive fire, a shot having disabled the horses. Accompanying Captain Peel, at the battle of Inkerman, as aide de camp. Devotion to his leader, Captain Peel, on June 18, 1855, in tying a tourniquet on his arm on the right of the Redan, while exposed to a very heavy fire.—Lieutenant William Nathan Wright Hewett: On the occasion of a sortie of Russ ans by Sir De Lacy Evans's division on the 26th of October, 1854, Mr. Hewett, then Acting Mate of her Majesty's ship Beagle, was in charge of the right Lancaster battery before Sebastopol. The advance of the Russians placed the gun in great jeopardy, and, some [illegible] the Allied [illegible] Mr. Hewett, [illegible] the guns [illegible] retreat, but Mr. Hewett, taking [illegible] the Lancaster Battery was attacked these three seamen mounted the banquette, and, under a heavy fire, made use of the disabled soldiers' muskets, which were loaded for them by others under the parapet.—Commander James Raby, Captain of the Forecastle John Taylor, and Boatswain's Mate Henry Curtis: On June 18, 1855, immediately after the assault on Sebastopol, commander Raby and the two seamen, climbing over the breast-work of the advanced sap, proceeded upwards of seventy yards across the open space towards the salient angle of the Redan, and, under the heavy fire which was then [illegible] continuing, succeeded in carrying a wounded soldier of the 57th Regiment to a place of safety.

ROYAL MARINES. Lieutenant George Dare Dowell, Royal Marine Artillery: On the explosion having occurred on one of the rocket boats of the Arrogant, during the attack on some forts near Viborg, Lieutenant Dowell (who was on board the Ruby gun-boat, while his own boat was receiving a supply of rockets) was the first to jump into the quarter-boat of the Ruby, and with three volunteers, himself pulling the stroke oar, proceeded instantly, under a heavy fire of grape and musketry, and succeeded in taking up three of the boat's crew, and placing them on board the Ruby; and was mainly instrumental in bringing off the sinking cutter.—Corporal John Prettyjohn: Reported for gallantry in the battle of Inkerman, having served himself in an advanced post on [illegible] noticed as having shot four Russians.—Bombardier Thomas Wilkinson, Royal Marine Artillery: Specially recommended for gallant conduct in the advanced batteries, June 7, 1855, in placing sandbags to repair the work under a galling fire.

THE EDUCATIONAL CONFERENCE.

IN an age when, if great principles are sometimes debated, they are seldom carried out to their legitimate conclusions, and when to patch, to temporise, to tide over difficulties, and to take what is called steps in the right direction, are the highest efforts of statesmanship, it is not to be expected that so large a question as that of the Education of the People will make the progress which those most ardently desire who have most thoroughly studied it. Nevertheless, as a means of educating the public on the subject of Public Education, we anticipate that much good will result from the Conference which assembled at Willis's Rooms on Monday last, under the high presidency of the Prince Consort, and continued its deliberation during the week. The more the facts are debated, which show the deficiencies of education in the British Isles, as compared with education in such countries as Germany and the United States of America, where National Systems, conveying instruction to the lowest strata of Society, have been established, and reduced to successful practice, the sooner will the day come when this great nation shall imitate the good example, and rescue from utter ignorance the children of the poor.

The speech of the Prince in inaugurating the proceedings of the Conference was admirable as a summary of the question; and both in what it said, and in what it hinted but left unsaid, was statesmanlike and judicious. The main facts, as stated by his Royal Highness, and as known, with more or less precision, to all the advanced minds who have studied the question, are as simple as they are deplorable. Notwithstanding all the voluntary efforts, all the benevolence, all the liberality, of Churchmen and of Dissenters, of Corporations, and of individuals, there are in England and Wales, out of nearly five millions of children between the ages of three and fifteen years, little more than two millions who attend any school whatever, leaving 2,861,848—nearly three millions—who are not in receipt of school instruction. Yet the schools are in existence in every part of the country, rural as well as urban, which could provide for the instruction of the greater proportion of these neglected children. The well of clear water stands upon one side of the way and the wild horse stands upon the other; but there is no agency in existence which can bring the two together. The horse cannot see the water, or, seeing it, dreads that the benevolent hand which attempts to lead it to the spring will throw a bridle round its neck and carry it away into slavery. Nor is even this state of things—bad as it is—the worst part of the case. Of the two millions of children who attend existing schools, we are informed by the Prince that only 600,000—less than one-third—are above the age of nine. In other words, more than half of the poor children of England receive no school instruction at all; and two-thirds of the remainder are taken away from school at an age so early that it is quite impossible for them to have received any enduring benefit from school teaching. The result is, if these figures are correct, that only about one child out of every eight in this rich, civilised, and Christian country remains at school after its ninth year. Well may the Prince Consort exclaim that these are startling facts. But where is the remedy? Neither his Royal Highness, nor any other of the speakers, has ventured to divulge it in plain terms; though both he and they have indicated the direction which the remedy ought to take.

His Royal Highness stated, in eloquent and comprehensive terms, the political and religious difficulties which beset the question. "Some," he said, "have sought the aid of Government, others that of the Church to which they belong. Some have declared it to be the duty of the State to provide elementary instruction for the people at large; others have seen in State interference a check to the spontaneous exertions of the people themselves, and an interference with self-government. Some, again, have advocated a plan of compulsory education based upon local self-government, and others the voluntary system in its widest development. While these have been some of the political subjects of difference, those in the religious field have not been less marked and potent. We find, on the one hand, the wish to see secular and religious instruction separated, and the former recognised as an innate and inherent right, to which each member of society has a claim, and which ought not to be denied to him if he refuses to take along with it the inculcation of a particular dogma to which he objects as unsound; while we see, on the other hand, the doctrine asserted that no education can be sound which does not rest on religious instruction, and that religious truth is too sacred to be modified and tampered with, even in its minutest deductions, for the sake of procuring a general agreement."

Nothing could be better than this. On the social aspect and the social difficulties of the question his Royal Highness was equally clear in fact, equally sound in philosophy, and equally candid in avowal of the almost insuperable difficulties that surround the subject as with a belt of fire. "It will probably happen that, in this instance as in many others, the cause which produces the evil will be more easily detected than its remedy, and yet a just appreciation of the former must ever be the first and essential condition for the discovery of the latter. You will probably trace the cause of our social condition to a state of ignorance and lethargic indifference on the subject among the parents generally; but the root of the evil will, I suspect, also be found to extend into that field on which the political economist exercises his activity—I mean the labour market—demand and supply. To dissipate that ignorance and rouse from that lethargy may be difficult, but with the united and earnest efforts of all who are the friends of the working classes it ought, after all, to be only a question of time. What measures can be brought to bear upon the other root of the evil is a more delicate question, and will require the nicest care in handling, for there you cut into the very quick of the working man's condition. His children are not only his offspring, to be reared for a future independent position, but they constitute part of his productive power and work with him for the staff of life; the daughters especially are the handmaids of the house, the assistants of the mother, the nurses of the younger children, the aged, and the sick. To deprive the labouring family of their help would be almost to paralyse its domestic existence."

Where, again, we ask, is the remedy? The Bishop of Oxford almost stumbled upon it—but did not see it. He believed that the indifference of parents was one great cause of the evil they lamented, and that it was one only to be removed by awakening the minds of the working classes to the responsibility which lay upon them in this matter. He urged that the friends of education should exert themselves to show to the vast body of parents that the use of the schools was a positive and certain gain to their children, and recommended that for this purpose they should be united among themselves, and end their disputes and differences as to the value of the boon to be given. We wish we could see any hope that the recommendations of the Bishop would be successful. To expect religious men, the members of hostile sects, who war against each other with a bitterness in inverse proportion to the smallness and insignificance of the doctrinal differences between them, is to expect too much from English human nature. If we wait until that day dawns, not even the great-grandchildren of the three millions of infants from three to fifteen years of age now non-attendant at schools in England will be in a better position as regards education than their remote progenitors.

The question still remains—how are we to act upon the parents? and how shall we awaken in them that sense of responsibility towards their chi'dren and towards society of which they are now ignorant? The present system is evidently wrong. Education is given to the poor as a favour—as an act of condescension on the part of the rich. The begging-box is sent round for educational purposes. A great stir is made about schools, and the Rector, Vicar, or Curate of the parish competes with the Dissenting preacher for the prize of the child, as if there were something to be gained to the one party or the other from the child's attendance at school—a gain which the parent cannot always see; but which, if he can see, he imagines to belong, not to the child, but to the Church or the Chapel which struggles to gain possession of it. Now, it is one of the best characteristics of the English working population that they do not like favours from their superiors in society; and that, when not in absolute poverty and misery, they look with suspicion on a too ostentatious and too clamorous benevolence. If the Legislature of this great nation affirmed it to be the sacred, the inalienable, right of every British child to receive education, we think, as we have taken many an occasion to express in this Journal, that nine-tenths of the difficulties which now surround this question would melt away, like mists before the sun. The English people neither require nor approve of favours from the Government or the upper classes. The aged, the impotent, and the destitute are not maintained by the Poor Law as a favour, but as a right. Why should not the young children have as much right to their education as to their mere subsistence? And, if such a noble principle were established, would not the parents be the jealous, as well as the natural, guardians of the right, and insist, for their children, upon all the advantages to be derived from it? We are not sanguine enough to expect such a step in advance as this would be; but we are confident that, until that principle be acted upon, the national progress in Education will continue to be what it has hitherto been—slow and unsatisfactory, though not utterly worthless.

ROYAL THAMES YACHT CLUB SCHOONER MATCH.

THIS is generally the most interesting match of the season, inasmuch as it presents the most scope for the display of smart seamanship, and to the mere spectator affords a very delightful excursion. The weather was beautiful in the extreme on Friday week, although, from the circumstance of the wind being right ahead the whole of the "down" race, that portion of the trip was rendered a little tedious. The Prince of Wales (Margate) steamer was chartered for the accommodation of the club, and started from Adelaide-wharf punctually at ten o'clock. The deck of this fine steamer was crowded by a goodly company, the élite including the Commodore of the Yacht Club, Lord Alfred Paget, who joined the vessel at Blackwall; Count Batthyani; Mr. Bramley-Moore, M.P.; Mr. John Walter, M.P.; Sir John Cathcart, and a number of naval gentlemen, amateur and professional. There was also a large assemblage of ladies. The two prizes—the first a splendid silver-gilt soup tureen, and the second an elegant frosted silver ewer—were displayed in the saloon for the inspection of the visitors.

Gravesend was attained soon after twelve o'clock, and from that port the following yachts duly started, a sixth, the Pet (160 tons), of Plymouth, owned by Mr. Alfred Tooth, having been withdrawn at the last moment:—

FIRST CLASS, EXCEEDING 75 TONS.

| Vessels. | Tons. | Ports. | Owners. |
|---|---|---|---|
| Zouave .. | 99 .. | Southampton .. | Mr. R Arabin. |
| May Fly .. | 113 .. | Cowes .. | Mr. G. P. Bidder. |

SECOND CLASS, UNDER 75 TONS

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Aquiline .. | 66 .. | Harwich .. .. | Mr Cardinall. |
| Wildfire .. | 60 .. | Cowes .. | Mr. Turner Turner. |
| Vestal .. | 74 .. | Southampton .. | Mr. F. O. Marshall. |

Quarter-minute time per ton for difference of tonnage in each class. The distance to be sailed was from Gravesend, round the Mouse Light, and back to Greenhithe a distance of nearly forty miles. The start took place at 6h. 30m. 47s.; it was an excellent one for all; but the Wildfire, hampered by a moored vessel in her path, was the last off.

The Aquiline led slightly, but soon their positions were altered the Vestal shooting by her to second, the Zouave being third, and the Wildfire fourth. Soon the last named began to mend, and off the Chapman, by dint of the most capital sailing, their positions were altered to Vestal first, Wildfire second, Zouave third, and next the Aquiline, the first named leading by a quarter of a mile. From this moment the great contest lay between the Vestal and the Wildfire, which were qualified by their speed for the first instead of the second prize. It certainly was one of the prettiest matches on record; and they arrived at the Mouse Light in the following order:—

| | H. | M. | S. |
|---|---|---|---|
| Wildfire .. .. .. .. .. .. | 4 | 28 | 20 |
| Vestal .. .. .. .. .. .. | 4 | 32 | 20 |
| Zouave .. .. .. .. .. .. | 4 | 42 | 20 |
| Aquiline .. .. .. .. .. .. | 4 | 43 | 20 |
| | 4 | 46 | 20 |

Immediately after turning, the Vestal began to draw upon the Wildfire, and off Holehaven became level with her, and the most exciting race followed. They drew one another again and again to Lower Hope Point, where the Vestal gradually drew away, and, although she carried away her gaff topsail yard towards the close of the match, they finished at Greenhithe as follows:—

| | H. | M. | S. |
|---|---|---|---|
| Vestal .. .. .. .. .. .. | 7 | 15 | 45 |
| Wildfire .. .. .. .. .. .. | 7 | 20 | 15 |
| Zouave .. .. .. .. .. .. | 7 | 24 | 39 |
| Aquiline .. .. .. .. .. .. | 7 | 46 | 0 |

The Vestal allowing a quarter of a minute per ton, and the difference being 14 tons, gave her the victory by the time we have described, and, beating the Zouave, she took the first prize.

The prizes were afterwards presented by Lord Alfred Paget to the respective owners of the Vestal and Zouave, the first prize in value to the Vestal.

The band of the Coldstreams played during the day; and the luncheon was provided by Mr. Watts, in that excellent and superior style which makes the Prince of Wales the most eligible of all the river steamers for these occasions

The Vestal was built by Inman, of Lymington, and in beauty is not excelled, if equalled, by any schooner afloat. She was sailed on this occasion by Pittock, of the Thought cutter, in his usual excellent style.

In our notice last week of the Royal London Yacht Club match, an error occurred in the names of the two last vessels and their owners, which should have been the Mystery, 18 tons, J. P. Dormay, Esq.; and the Kitten, 13 tons, R. Leach, Esq.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

Count Paul de Kisseleff, the Russian Ambassador, went on Saturday to St. Cloud, to deliver to the Empress, on the part of his Sovereign, the Grand Cordon of the Order of St. Catherine.

The subject of the elections still continues predominant in Paris. At four o'clock on Monday afternoon, the voting, which commenced on Sunday morning, terminated throughout France. So far as Paris is concerned, the elections have excited a movement far greater than were generally anticipated. It was not so much felt on Sunday; but the whole of Monday, and particularly the early part of it, the people was up and stirring. The right of taking out voting tickets continued up to the moment of closing the ballot-boxes, so that, between the crowds who flocked to take out their ballotins, and those anxious to deposit them, the mairies and the other voting-places were crowded to the utmost. The recommendation that had been given to the working classes to proceed en masse on Monday rather than on Sunday was pretty generally attended to. This recommendation arose from a suspicion entertained that, between the hours of closing on Sunday evening and of recommencing on Monday morning, the too-zealous agents of the Government might take upon themselves to remove the seals with which are affixed to the ballot-boxes before being transferred to the respective mairies, abstracting the tickets that were unfavourable to the Government candidate, and substituting others of a contrary description. This feeling had acquired such consistency among the working class, ever suspicious of the good faith of those in power, that in the Banlieue the National Guard requested to be allowed to take the place of the regular soldiers, to whose care the ballot-boxes were intrusted during the night. The Government at once acceded to the request.

The results of the Paris elections are as follow:—Of the ten circumscriptions into which Paris is divided Government candidates have been returned in the 1st, 2nd, 4th, 7th, 8th, 9th, and 10th districts; in the 3rd, 5th, and 6th districts, Cavaignac, Carnot, and Goudchaux (Republican candidates) have been respectively returned. The 3rd district (where Cavaignac was returned) and the 4th and 7th districts (in both of which Government candidates were returned) have, however, ended without result—the absolute majorities of the whole numbers of registered electors in those places, as required by law, not having been obtained; and a second election for those circumscriptions will, therefore, take place, commencing on Sunday, July 5.

The success of the electoral demonstration in Paris against the Government of Louis Napoleon has far surpassed the most sanguine expectations that the Republicans had allowed themselves to entertain. Two of the Opposition candidates, MM. Carnot and Goudchaux, have been elected by enormous majorities. Cavaignac is at the head of the poll; and, although his election is not definitive, owing to his not having obtained an absolute majority of the registered electors, there can be no doubt of his being elected at the second trial on Sunday, July 5. In the fourth circumscription, the rival opposition candidates, E. Olivier and Garnier Pagès, obtained between them within 143 votes of the score of the Government candidate, M. Varin. In the seventh, M. Lanquetin, the Government candidate, had but 2,000 votes more than those given to MM. Darimon and Jules Bastide. In both these latter circumscriptions the bare majority of the Government candidates is insufficient and these must be new elections. It cannot be doubted that MM Garnier Pagès and Bastide will retire, and then there will be every prospect of the election of MM. Olivier and Darimon. Should these hopes be realised, out of the ten seats for Paris five will have been gained by the Opposition; and it is to be observed besides that in the second circumscription M. Bethmont ran M. Devinck very hard, being beaten by only 10 472 against 9070.

Several interesting facts are proved by the returns of the Paris elections. Thus, in 1852, at the first election under the Empire, Government obtained a majority of 44,000 votes in the capital; that majority is now only 14,000. In the first elections only three Opposition candidates were returned in all France. Paris has now alone elected two Opposition members, and has, de facto, elected three.

In the departments, however, the elections have been most favourable to the Government; indeed, if all the Opposition candidates had been elected, they would have formed an exceedingly small minority.

The total success of the Opposition appears to be—five Republicans and six Independent members. The latter comprise gentlemen of more or less liberal opinions, who have triumphed over Government candidates.

AUSTRIA.

Vienna was gay the latter part of last week with the centenary festival of the Austrian military Order of Maria Theresa, the coveted honour of all gallant soldiers in the Austrian army. If an officer has displayed extraordinary self-devotion and contempt of danger, he, "at the recommendation of his comrades," obtains the Knight's Cross of the Order; if a superior officer acts on his own responsibility, without orders from his chief, and by so doing turns the tide of war in favour of the flag under which he serves, he, "on the strength of evidence given by his fellows," receives the Commander's Cross. The Grand Cross is given only to those commanders who have fought and won a pitched battle, or have taken the initiative in critical moments, and by so doing have saved their country from some great danger. The only Grand Crosses are the Archduke John (1809), Marshal Count Radetzky (1848), and Marshal Prince Windischgratz (1850). The ten Commanders are the King of Wurtemberg; Marshal Count Nugent (1813), who is an Irishman by birth; Count Jellachich, Baron Hess, Count Thurn, the Archduke Albrecht, Count Wimpffen, Count Schlick, the Neapolitan General Filangieri, and the Russian General Ladics (1849). There are seventy-nine Austrian and some twenty-two foreign Knights. The only foreign Knights who were present at the festival were Prince Charles of Bavaria, Sir F. Moresby, Lord Seaton, General Sachosanet, and General Panlutine.

TURKEY.

According to the Times correspondent, a spirit of discontent is breaking out in Bulgaria, requiring a modification of the relations of Church and State. A number of petitions from Bulgarian communities have been presented to the Porte, complaining against the higher clergy sent there from Constantinople, and against their endeavours to substitute for Slavonic the Literary and to introduce the Greek language instead. We are reminded that the immense majority of the Christians of the Oriental Church in European Turkey are not Greeks by race or language. Indeed, out of the 10 000,000 belonging to that religion in Europe and Turkey, only 1,000,000 are Greeks; of the rest 5,000,000 are [illegible] in Wallachia and Moldavia, less than 1,500,000 Armenians, and the rest are either Slavs by race, or have become Slavonians in process of time. In this number the Bulgarians are rather more than 3,500,000. With the exception of the Armenians and 1,000,000 Servians, who constituted themselves as early as the fourteenth century into a national Church, all the Christians of the Oriental Church are under the spiritual rule of the Greek Patriarch and his Synod at Constantinople.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

The present Session of the Cape Parliament was opened on the 7th of April by his Excellency Sir George Grey, who had just returned from the frontier. His Excellency expressed his satisfaction at the conduct and appearance of the German Legion, and gave a favourable account of the state of the frontiers, and of the general condition of the colony. The speech was received with great satisfaction by the two Houses and the country. All the Government bills with reference to the frontier policy of his Excellency have either been unanimously agreed to by the two Houses or carried by large majorities. The Colonial Government on the 27th April sustained a severe defeat in the House of Assembly. A bill had been introduced for a system of public education. The bill intended to overthrow the first-class schools which are at present maintained solely by the Government, and to grant aid to schools only on condition of local contribution, and also proposed to abolish the office of Superintendent-General of Education, and to place the Colonial Secretary, ex officio, at the head of that department. It was thrown out on the second reading by a majority of 25 to 9.

Accounts from the Kaffir frontier state that all the disputes and [illegible] were commended that it be proceeded with

The Kaffirs were quiet, but in great distress, and many of them were entering the colony to seek for employment.

UNITED STATES

It is stated that General Cass has written to [illegible] positively declining to reopen negotiations for the present on the Central American affairs, and that America will not do so until England recedes from her unwarrantable assumptions in regard to those States. Mr. Buchanan refuses to recognise Costa Rica in the matter of the Nicaragua transit route.

According to present indications the late collision between the Federal and State authorities in Ohio will not terminate without some further trouble.

Reliable intelligence from Kansas indicates the certainty of that being made a free State, as the settlers are overwhelming in favour of freedom.

The President is moving in a decided manner with reference to Utah affairs 2500 troops are now on the march for the territory, and several hundred others will soon follow. Colonel Cumming has received the appointment of Governor of Utah. At the latest dates from that territory all was perfectly quiet.

AUSTRALIA.

The chief event in the New South Wales papers is the prorogation of Parliament after the most stormy session incidental to the first workings of a responsible Government

The Hunter River Railway, from Newcastle to Maitland, has been formally opened, and will in future be known as the Great Northern Railway. Its length is the same as the Sydney and Paramatta line, about sixteen miles, and its cost nearly £170,000

It is in contemplation to effect some changes in the colonial tariff, if possible, to assimilate those of the province of Victoria and South Australia.

A Select Committee appointed to inquire into the feasibility of establishing a telegraphic communication between Sydney and London via India has reported in favour of the scheme. The recommendation is, however, accompanied by the suggestion that the cost must probably be met by the withdrawal of the subsidy to the steam mail-packets.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

VISCOUNTESS EVERSLEY.

The lamented death of the Right Hon. Emma Laura, Viscountess Eversley, took place unexpectedly, after a few days' illness, on the 24th instant, at her new family residence in Eaton-place. Her Ladyship was the youngest daughter of the celebrated Samuel Whitbread, Esq., M.P., by his wife, the Lady Elizabeth, eldest daughter of Charles, first Earl Grey, and was married, the 24th June, 1817, to the Right Hon. Charles Shaw Lefevre, the recent Speaker of the House of Commons, who was raised to the Peerage as Viscount Eversley on the 2nd of March last. By this marriage her Ladyship leaves issue three daughters, the second of whom, Helena, was married, the 26th February, 1851, to Sir Henry B. P. St. John Mildmay, Bart.

LORD ALVANLEY.

THE RIGHT HON. RICHARD PEPPER ARDEN, third Baron Alvanley, of Alvanley, in the county of Chester, died on the 24th inst., from an attack of gout in the stomach, at his house, 12, Bruton-street, Berkeley-square. His Lordship was the younger son of the great lawyer, Richard Pepper Arden, Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas, and first Lord Alvanley, and was born the 8th Dec., 1782. He for some time in his earlier life served in the British army, and rose to the rank of Lieut.-Colonel. He married, the 26th April, 1841, the Lady Arabella Vane, third daughter of William Henry, first Duke of Cleveland, and sister of Henry, the present Duke, but has had no issue. He succeeded to the family honours on the death of his elder brother, William, the second Baron, the 24th Nov., 1849. By his own demise the title becomes extinct, as two sisters only survive him, one of whom is the present Lady Warrender.

D. A. SAUNDERS DAVIES, ESQ.

DAVID ARTHUR SAUNDERS DAVIES, Esq., M.P. for Carmarthenshire, who died suddenly at the University Club, on the 22nd ult., was the only son of David Davies, Esq., by his wife, Susanna, the only surviving daughter of Erasmus Saunders, Esq., of Pentre, in the county of Pembroke, through whom he is lineally descended from the Gwynns of Moel-Ifor, Cardiganshire—an estate now held by his son and successor. He was born in 1792; was educated at Harrow, and at Christ Church, Oxford; and was called to the bar of Lincoln's Inn. He was elected Chairman to the Cardiganshire Quarter Sessions, 1826, and continued to hold that office till his death. He first offered himself on the invitation of the constituency for the representation in Parliament of the county of Carmarthen, in 1841, and was then, as at every sub-equent election, including the recent general election, returned without opposition. Mr. Saunders Davies at the time of his decease held the office of Deputy-Lieutenant for the county. He married, in 1826, Elizabeth Maria, only daughter of Colonel Philipps, of Williamston, county of Pembroke, first cousin to Sir Richard Philipps, Bart., M.P. for Haverfordwest, by whom, who died in 1851, he has had issue three sons and two daughters—viz., Arthur Henry Saunders, born the April 21, 1827, who succeeds him, and Owen Gwyn Saunders, a Lieutenant in the Royal Navy, who fell at the Redan, June 18, 1855. Henry Saunders, the second son, and Susanna Maria Anne, who was married in 1851 to James John, second son of Thomas Lloyd, Esq., of Bronwydd, Cardiganshire, Mr. Saunders Davies was a magistrate and Deputy-Lieutenant for the counties of Carmarthen, Pembroke, and Cardigan. The family of Mr. Saunders Davies returned a member to Parliament for Cardigan as far back as 1553 and 1572

SKETCHES IN PARLIAMENT.

PERHAPS the chief feature in the doings of our Legislature during the last few days has been a broad hint or two given to Lord Palmerston that he is not omnipotent in Parliament. Great conquerors have often fallen in the very flush of victory by very small agencies; and Palmerston received his first defeat in his own Parliament from Sir Denham Norreys.

The occasion was suggestive. It afforded a curious proof that when Job meets job then comes the tug of war. The question was whether the landlords of Scotland were to get their estates surveyed, down to the marking of the very acres of every one of their farms, at the cost of the purchase of an Ordnance map for a pound, with the advantage of twenty-four inches to the mile over English proprietors, while Irish country gentlemen had only obtained a benefit over the Saxons to the extent of five inches. The combat between the Celtic elements raged with various fortune for many a long hour; the insertion of a word or two—meek and sarcastic respectively—by Sir William Jolliffe and Mr. Henley, from the Saxon point of view, being utterly lost in the dialectic and idiomatic storm of words raised by the members for the sister kingdoms. The Government unwisely suffered its Scottish representative at the Treasury to pledge it to the Caledonian requirements in the matter; and, spite of an appeal truly pathetic from the Premier not to embarrass him with the figure-compelling Mr. Wilson by touching his Estimates, a majority of the House decided that, although they could not now prevent Ireland from having six inches, Scotland should not have an ell, while England had only an inch. The interview between Lord Duncan, the present member of the Government, who had led them into this minority, with Mr. Hayter, must have been affecting; and, doubtless, Duncan was driven by the whips and scorns of the Secretary to the Treasury into a fitful fever, after which he did not sleep well. As for Sir Denham Norreys, his mild and gentle aspect was so changed next day, his port was so grand and swelling, that, having a motion on the paper for altering the mode of voting on the Estimates, Lord Palmerston was fain to beg him, as he had found he had a giant's strength, not to use it like a giant, and to spare the Government another defeat. The worthy member, having been just the day before, was generous then, and gave way; and when he brought on a third motion, relating to the fiscal arrangements of Irish counties, he did seem a little conscious of the fact that he had become famous as the Parliamentary personage of the week: all who are mere mortals will sympathise with and excuse him. Indeed, in considering the effect on his mind of such a feat as he had achieved, one could not but look to other consequences which flowed from that circumstance coupled, perhaps, with the narrow majority (gained only by proxies) in the Lords by which Government carried the second reading of the Ministers' Money Bill. For the first time since the meeting of the new Parliament Mr. Disraeli assailed the Ministry in something of his old trenchant style—very much diluted, certainly, in the style; but as haughty—not to say insolent as ever in the manner. To be sure the occasion was tempting, for Lord Palmerston had shrunk from asserting the great principle he laid down in the famous "Civis Romanus sum" speech, and did not protect the British subject or the British flag outraged at Greytown by the strong arm of the United States. Perhaps the First Minister was not sorry that, having already spoken, the rules of the House prevented his making an attempt to justify his falling away (even according to the idea of a leader of Opposition) from a doctrine so essentially Palmerstonian.

In these days the civilised world is deprived of the satisfaction—we will not say pleasure—of seeing the effect on a person of his being placed in the pillory; but a lively notion of the aspect of a culprit in the stocks may be presented to the imagination by witnessing the such a guise may be presented to the imagination by witnessing the scene which attends the examination of a man at the bar of the House of Commons. The prisoner (for he is even in such a character for the nonce) is surrounded by officers of the House, headed by the Serjeant-at-Arms, holding the mace apparently in a convenient position for using it after the manner of Walworth when he arranged the little difference between the King and Wat Tyler; and he is carefully docked out of the House by an actual brass rod, which slides after the manner of a telescope into positive vision, over the space which is technically and abstractedly the "bar," is the same way that there is a Holborn bar and a Smithfield bar. There he stands, pale and frightened, while the Speaker shakes his powdery locks (of his wig) at him, and interrogates him, with all the terror which surrounds a Parliamentary Rhadamanthus. It was on an unusually dull Friday evening, when the spasmodic speech-making and questioning with which members always think it necessary to wind up the week's work had been quite infinitesimal, and the House was about to subside into business, when the dreadful rod was announced that some corruption, flagrant and palpable, had been found out (that was the rub) in connection with the Rochdale election petition. The House was roused in a moment, just as the lounging tranquillity of a meet at cover is changed into excited bustle at the sound of the huntsman's view-halloo. Man must hunt something, and the House of Commons loves a man-hunt, and is not particular whether the hue and cry is after one of their own members or any one else. On this occasion, technically speaking, the chase was a legitimate one, and when the first witness came to the bar there was a famous meet of members to "assist at the death." Positively, the Speaker is a nervous man. Nothing could be more hesitating and inefficient than his mode of interrogating the witnesses. Lord Palmerston interposed with only so much success as accompanied his natural and acquired ease of manner; but the real leader in the Attorney-General for Ireland, whose old Nisi Prius instincts were instantly aroused, and who went in for the luxury of cross-examination with a sense of enjoyment which only lawyers know. On the face of it the business was a bad business; but it was not long ere it seemed that, notwithstanding the vigour of the House the main offender would slip through its fingers, and this not the less from the anxious desire of members to give publicity to the affair. Cannot one just conceive that the anger of honourable members when excluded from the deliberations of the Committee may have been caused, not so much by a simple virtuous indignation at their not being allowed to express their detestation of corruption by mobbing the decoy of Rochdale, as by a desire to see how it happened that the thing was discovered? But let us be charitable.

A remarkable feature in this Session is the tendency to work shown by the Lords. They have given up their chartered sittings from five to seven, and hang bravely on, night after night, till nine or ten. Even the Bishops, who are accustomed to enter a standing protest against fashionable extravagance in the matter of time by dining punctually at half-past six, and who usually leave the Episcopal benches quaint at a quarter past that hour, have remained in a serried phalanx, variegated by white lawn and black silk, till most unclerical hours. But, indeed, the whole tendency of Parliament this year is to treat the Session as a period in which a number of disinterested gentlemen are to work eighteen hours a day for their country's good, and to enable Parliament to adjourn before September. The sittings in both Houses are long and late, while the work at Committees in the mornings is of a nature to excite the surprise of the most stalwart gold-diggers. There is a symptom that energetic and conscientious memberdom will have its reward by a prorogation, at least in the middle of August; for the first Government bill of the Session has been withdrawn, on the ground that there will be no time to pass it this year

COUNTRY NEWS.

THE MANCHESTER ART-TREASURES EXHIBITION.—Most extensive preparations have been and are still being made in Manchester for the reception of her Majesty on Tuesday next. We annex a few details from the official programme of the ceremonial. Her Majesty, attended by his Royal Highness the Prince Albert, his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, her Royal Highness the Princess Royal, his Royal Highness the Prince Alfred, her Royal Highness the Princess Alice, and his Royal Highness Prince Frederick William of Prussia, will leave Worsley Hall, the seat of the Right Hon the Earl of Ellesmere, at nine o'clock, in the Royal carriages. The procession will be escorted by the Lancashire Yeomanry. Her Majesty will arrive at the Exhibition building at eleven o'clock precisely, and will be received by a guard of honour and a Royal salute. Her Majesty and the Royal party, entering the reception-room, will be thence conducted by the president, the chairman, and the members of the Executive Committee, along the central hall to the dais in the transept; and, having taken their places on the dais, the orchestra will perform the National Anthem; upon the conclusion of which an address will be presented to her Majesty by the chairman, on behalf of the Executive Committee of the Exhibition, to which her Majesty will graciously reply. The address from the Mayor and Corporation of Manchester will then be read, to which also her Majesty will reply. The orchestra of 605 performers will then perform the Coronation Anthem (Handel), during the performance of which her Majesty and the Royal visitors will proceed to examine the picture-galleries, which will be exclusively reserved for the Royal party until their departure from the Exhibition. The Royal visitors will then return to the Transept, and will be conducted along the central hall to the reception-room

WEST-STREET, D'URBAN, NATAL.

THE ZULUS OF NATAL.

(From a Correspondent.)

IN the present stormy state of South African politics the annexed Portrait (from a photograph by Tunny, of Edinburgh) may interest our readers. It is that of Sifilé, a genuine Zulu boy, who, about fifteen months ago, accompanied his master, Mr. S., from Port Natal to Edinburgh, where he resided till a few days ago, when he left for Port Natal. He is about seventeen years of age, son of a Kaffir witch-doctor (uanusi or inzanga), follower of Mawe (aunt of Panda, present King of the Zulus), who fled from Zululand to Natal about the time of Sifilé's birth, and his name, signifying nearly dead, is said to have been given from the hardships endured by his mother during her flight. Before leaving Africa he had been about five years in Mr. S.'s employment, most of the time being spent in the Zulu country, where Sifilé, though a mere child, was often left in sole charge of a waggon and a large quantity of property, to which he invariably proved a bold and faithful protector. While in Britain he readily adopted European habits, learned to read and write, and evinced great anxiety and capability for information and improvement.

Sifilé wears the dress of the Zulus, the goatskin girdle (umutya), and holds the usual Zulu weapons—viz., an assegai (umkouto, or ikwa), of which, on an expedition, they carry three smaller for throwing; that in his hand (ikwa), being kept till the last for close quarters, their favourite mode of fighting. The loss of the ikwa was punished by impalement on return from an expedition, unless the soldier brought the weapon of a dead enemy. Besides the assegai, he holds two clubs (twisa, literally knocker-down), of which the oval-headed one was a present to Sifilé's master from Tyongwin, a popular son of Panda, and probably he who had his hands cut off in the late disturbances; the other club and the assegai were taken for insolence from a Zulu of the Umlwan regiment, the principal actors in the recent massacre, and of which Ciwaya Umbulas, the leader of the insurrection, who was flayed alive, and several more of Panda's sons were captains. Round his neck is a buffalo-horn box for snuff, of which all Kaffirs are immederately fond, and use till the tears run down their cheeks.

The Zulus proper are a comparatively small tribe, who, by the genius of Panda's elder brother, Tyaka, about thirty years ago, became the most powerful tribe in South Africa, subduing all around for hundreds of miles, and incorporating the conquered tribes (except those who fled and are known in the Cape as Fingoes) into one vast nation, called by the white men indiscriminately Zulus, but by themselves still retaining their tribal names.

Tyaka's armies twice swept Kaffirland to the borders of the Cape territory, and were probably prevented entering the colony only by the murder of Tyaka by his brother Dingaan, in 1828. Dingaan reigned for a comparatively quiet period of ten years, extending his protection to the few English settlers at Port Natal, and allowing missions to be established; but about the end of that time the Dutch emigrants from the Cape arrived in Natal, and, after some hard fighting and much suffering, succeeded in weakening the Zulu power, killing Dingaan and placing Panda on the throne of a territory bounded at the south by the Tukela river, the north-east limit of Natal. On the British taking final possession of Natal, and routing the Dutch in 1843, Panda at once declared for us, and has ever since been friendly, possibly more from fear of the Dutch than love for us. He is a very stout good-looking man of say fifty years of age, of a humane disposition for a Kaffir, never killing more of his subjects than, as he says, is absolutely necessary to make them remember he is their King. But notwithstanding this leniency, his subjects have always shown a predilection for British rule, and thousands have yearly crossed the boundary and settled in Natal, where they pay a hut-tax of some £10,000 a year most regularly and cheerfully, and where they form a splendid source of labour, if governed with only common discretion. There are in Natal about 120,000 of these refugees; but not more than 3000 of them are Zulus proper, who stick well by their King. The rest are members of vanquished tribes, many of them the original inhabitants of Natal.

The Zulus are a tall, athletic, handsome race, with a bold military carriage—honest and hospitable among themselves. Every man becomes a soldier and joins a regiment when he is about sixteen, and to this regiment he belongs for the remainder of his life, and must be ready to start at a moment's warning for the military kraal of his regiment, where he spends six months of each year. There may be some twenty of these regiments, each distinguished by the colour of the shield (isihlangu), and some by a head-dress. These regiments are divided into married (amododa) and unmarried (insiywa) soldiers. A whole regiment marries at once, by the King's order; but after they have once got permission they may take any number of wives.

They have never been at war with the British, and from their very courage and predilection for close quarters, and fighting in open country, were never to be dreaded like the skulking Amaxosa, our usual enemy, though superior to them in everything but the possession of fire-arms. And now their power seems broken for ever, and the only trouble we shall have will be in finding capital to supply work for them as refugees in Natal.

The Zulu country is in most parts superior to Port Natal, both as an agricultural and a grazing county; there is very fine timber in some parts, it is well watered, and more than one of the rivers might be made, not navigable, but into good harbours for small craft. A more beautiful country does not exist, and with these advantages it seems a pity to let a race of white barbarians, like the Dutch Boers, get possession of it, even if it did not vitally concern Natal, that no foreign Power should have possession of a port to supply the Transvaal Republic, Orange-tree State, and other places in the interior, with merchandise. But we hope the British Government will see to this, and, at least, keep possession of the coast, and prevent the slavery and massacre of the Zulus sure to follow the occupation of this land by the Dutch.

FISH TAKEN OFF ST. THOMAS'S.

May 14, on board La Plata, off St. Thomas's.

THIS fish, of which I send you the drawing, was caught about 1500 miles N.E. of St. Thomas's, amongst the Gulf weed. Imagine an ugly bloated sort of perch, with a slimy, offensive skin somewhat allied to the frog, inasmuch as it had lungs. Its fins resemble hands; the tail is unfishlike, coming to a point. This creature has no means of defence, but it is marked so like the weed it lives in that it would be most difficult to find. The extremities are so soft and flubby that they look just like seaweed floating about. It lives on shrimps and small crabs, which frequent the Gulf of Florida: it has no teeth, but its gums are hard; six or seven small crabs were found whole in its stomach. The Sketch, which I am enabled to send you through the kindness of my friend Lieut. Archer, of the 3rd West India Regiment, is four-fifth the size of this remarkable creature, which was thrown on board by the wheel of the steamer.

FISH TAKEN IN THE GULF WEED OFF ST. THOMAS'S

THE LATE MR. ROBERT HALL, M.P.

THE death of this highly-respected member for the borough of Leeds took place at Folkestone on the 26th ult. At the recent general election he was returned after a close and severe struggle, the labour and excitement of which told seriously upon his system. He is also stated to have received injury from sitting in the House of Commons near one of the openings for the admission of air. Influenza came on, and added to the depression of his system. He retired to Folkestone for relaxation: here he grew worse, and expired in a few days. We abridge the following memoir of his career from the Leeds Intelligencer:—

Mr. Hall was born at Leeds, in 1801, and was the only child of the venerable Henry Hall, Esq., of Bank Lodge, who survives him, the representative of one of the oldest and most respected families in Leeds. On attaining his boyhood he was sent to the Grammar School at Heath, near Halifax, where he remained three years, and was then removed to the Leeds Grammar School. After a most successful school career he went to Oxford, and entered as a commoner at Christ Church: he took the degree of B.A. in 1823, being placed in the 1st class in classics, and in the second class in mathematics, and of M.A. 1826. In 1826 he was called to the bar at Lincoln's-inn, and from that time up to his death he was a distinguished member of the Northern Circuit, enjoying an extensive and increasing practice in the Nisi Prius Courts. He left Leeds in the year 1845, and went to reside in the Middle Temple, London. In his profession he was not prominent as a practitioner in the courts, but was esteemed one of the best chamber counsel at the bar. He was deeply read in law, and possessed a sound and cautious judgment, which seldom led him astray in giving his opinion on the questions submitted to him; and in this branch of his profession he enjoyed a large and lucrative practice until a serious railway accident in 1855 compelled him to limit his labours. In 1842 he was appointed Deputy Recorder of Leeds, and in 1845 Recorder of Doncaster, both of which appointments he held at the time of his death. In 1848 he was appointed Lecturer on Common Law at the Inner Temple, and held the appointment up to 1852. The duties which these appointments devolved upon him were ever discharged with singular ability and impartiality.

THE LATE MR. ROBERT HALL, M.P. FOR LEEDS.

His high professional position, though it absorbed most of his time, did not preclude him from devoting his attention to important social and political question. He was known as a warm and attached supporter of local charities, and of the Church of England. During his residence in Leeds he was elected a patron of the parish church, and also one of the Committee of Pious Uses. He originated and personally superintended a Sunday School at Richmond-road, Bank; and to the time of his death was the teacher of the first class in the Sunday Schools of St. John's, Westminster. Of later years his studies had been directed more especially to the important question of the treatment of juvenile criminals, to which his mind was turned by the experiences his judicial duties too frequently afforded. During the long vacations he usually visited the Continent, and inspected the principal reformatories in France and Germany, and during these tours secured the friendship of M. de Metz, one of the founders of Mettray. Subsequently he published two lectures, one on "Mettray," and the other "Visits to Continental Reformatories," in which he gave expression to his own views on the great social problem of his day. It was to forward this great object, which had become to him one of intense and absorbing interest, that Mr. Hall more especially was desirous of a seat in Parliament: and, had his life been spared, he would have in all probability distinguished himself as a legislator in all matters pertaining to social reform. Amongst the minor studies to which he devoted himself was that of natural history, and more especially the department of geology, of which his knowledge was very extensive. He was an active supporter of the Leeds Philosophical and Literary Society, before the members of which he read many valuable papers.

Mr. Hall inherited the political sentiments of his father, and was a consistent Conservative, anxious to extend electoral reform within what he believed to be the limits of the Constitution, but earnestly and determinately opposed to extreme measures, tending to revolutionise the Constitution and to swamp the representation of property in that of mere numbers. Trained in political life by the example of his father, he took an active part in political questions, and was one of the most energetic supporters of Mr Michael Thomas Sadler at the general election in 1832. At the election of 1834, on Mr. Macaulay becoming a member of council in India, he acted as chairman of Sir John Beckett's committee. He occupied the same post at the general election in 1835, and contributed to Sir John Beckett's return on that occasion by the sound judgment and untiring energy which he displayed. The increasing professional claims upon his attention after this compelled him to withdraw for the time from active political life; and it was not until the general election of 1852, when he was nominated by the Conservatives of this borough at the eleventh hour, that he reappeared in the arena of politics. On that occasion he was unsuccessful, but he was returned, as already stated, for Leeds, at the general election in March last.

Mr. Hall's remains were interred on the 29th ult. in the family vault at Whitkirk Church. In the funeral cortège was a numerous attendance of the magistracy and gentry of Leeds; and the funeral service was read by the Rev. Mr. Martineau and the Rev. Dr. Hook, the latter reading impressively the lesson and the concluding portion of the service at the graveside.

The accompanying Portrait of Mr. Hall has been engraved from a painting in the possession of the family.

DISTIN'S MONSTER DRUM AT THE HANDEL FESTIVAL.

A PROMINENT feature in the orchestra at the late Handel Festival was the monster bass drum manufactured by Mr. Distin, the well-known musical instrument maker of Cranbourn-street, of which the above is an Engraving. The important aid which it lent to the instrumentation must have been appreciated by all who heard it. The diameter of the instrument is nearly seven feet. The tympanum was made from the largest buffalo-hide ever imported into England, reduced by machinery from a thickness of a quarter of an inch to the substance required. It was found impossible, by the usual steam process, to bend the woodwork of the frame, which had therefore to be composed of about 300 pieces nicely dovetailed together. The arrangements for tuning and strengthening are alike unique, and the tone is wonderfully rich, full, and resounding.

A large Engraving of the impressive scene of the Orchestra in the Crystal Palace, and the conclusion of our report of the performance, will be found elsewhere in the present Number.

CURIOUS PIECE OF CABINET-WORK.

A WORKING man, of the name of William Wollatt, who is engaged in the railway wood-key making business at Derby, struck by the beautiful form and colour of some of the natural excrescences of English trees, has occupied his leisure time for the last seven years in constructing the large hall-chair and footstool which we engrave. The chair is about eight feet high the strong framework of oak is covered by about ten thousand of these gnarly pieces of wood (some of which are remarkably appropriate; for instance, the knots forming the feet resemble lions' claws); the whole have been judiciously selected and neatly united together, and, though necessarily heavy, the chair moves with facility on its castors.

MANTCHOURI CRANES,

PRESENTED TO THE ZOOLOGICAL SOCIETY BY HER MAJESTY.

THE well-known interest evinced by her Majesty and the Royal family in favour of the Zoological Society, of which his Royal Highness Prince Albert is the president, has been made manifest by a continuous succession of presents of the rarest and most important additions to the collection of living animals.

The last of these gifts, which we have selected for our present Illustration, consisted of a pair of Mantchouri Cranes, obtained for her Majesty by Sir John Bowring from the north of China. These noble birds have a height of nearly five feet, and are by far the most striking and elegant species of the crane hitherto discovered.

Some ten years since the Zoological Society had scarcely a specimen of this widely-spread family of birds in their possession. They are now exceedingly rich in them, and there is not a more engaging spot in the gardens than the Crane Inclosure. In its quieter moods there is nothing more stately than a crane—we had almost said more graceful. In the exhilarated state—which appears to be superinduced by certain atmospheric conditions, such as the approach of stormy weather—the cranes one and all begin to dance and gesticulate in the most grotesque manner imaginable, and their performance in this way only yields in drollery to the lively sallies of the monkey tribe.

On Whit-Monday, when we last visited the gardens, the jackos were in great force, and held their admirers together with unflagging pertinacity. On that day, however, everything was popular. With 23,000 visitors and upwards, no nook of the establishment, much less a living thing in it, escaped notice; and, if public attention has any charms at all, every beast, bird, reptile, and fish in the menagerie must have been satisfied. It was a most gratifying spectacle to witness the orderly way in which this vast multitude conducted themselves in the enjoyment of their holiday; and it must certainly be a subject of the warmest congratulation to the society themselves that the liberal policy which they have recently adopted towards the public is so thoroughly appreciated by the working classes, of whom the visitors on Whit-Monday almost exclusively consisted.

The gardens are in the most beautiful state of order, and the collection unparalleled in interest and extent, with the prospect, as we are informed, of some very important additions now on their way from India. As upwards of 30,000 persons visited the gardens in the three first days of Whitsun week, there is every probability that the current year will be as eminently successful, in a financial point of view, as the establishment deserves. Looking upon it in the light of a purely national undertaking, although managed by private means, we intend to continue our Illustrations of successive novelties as they arrive throughout the summer. The Mantchouri Cranes have an aptitude for reproduction in Europe, and a pair of them, which were taken to Paris by M. Montigny, about the time at which the present birds were sent to her Majesty by Sir John Bowring, have already made their nest, and hatched there, in the Garden of Plants, in two successive seasons. The Mantchouri crane is at once distinguished from all the others by its superior stature and the brilliant contrast of its plumage.

THE COURT.

The most remarkable and gratifying feature in Court life during the past few days has been the extraordinary attendance at her Majesty's Levee, briefly noticed in our last impression. This reception was more numerously attended than any former Court at St. James's since her Majesty's fully attended than any former Court at St. James's since her Majesty's accession, with the exception of the first Levee held by the Queen on coming to the throne. Her Majesty commenced the reception at two o'clock, and the gentlemen attending continued passing uninterruptedly for the space of two hours and three-quarters. The presentations on this occasion exceeded 400.

On Monday the Queen drove out with the Princess Royal and Prince Frederick William, honoured the Princess's Theatre with her presence.

On Tuesday the Queen gave a State Ball at Buckingham Palace.

On Thursday the Queen held a Privy Council at Buckingham Palace.

On Friday the Queen distributed the "Order of Valour," in Hyde-park, in the presence of many thousands of spectators. There were only sixty-two recipients present.

THE DRAWINGROOM

The Queen held a Drawingroom in St. James's Palace on Tuesday afternoon. The ladies, upon their arrival, were conducted up the staircase to seats in Queen Anne's Room, which was divided, and afforded seats for fifty in each division. The two adjoining state-rooms were filled, each containing seats for fifty. The grand chamber to the east of the top of the staircase was filled; and the remainder of the company were ushered to seats in the Banquet-room, the most capacious saloon of the Palace. The company having the privilege of the entrée passed, as usual, into the Portrait Gallery and the Drawingroom.

Her Majesty the Queen, his Royal Highness Prince Albert, accompanied by the Princess Royal, arrived from Buckingham Palace, attended by the Ladies and Gentlemen in Waiting. Her Royal Highness the Princess Royal of Cambridge, his Imperial Highness the Archduke Maximilian of Austria, their Royal Highnesses Prince Frederick William of Prussia, the Duke of Cambridge, and the Hereditary Prince of Saxe-Meiningen presently entered, with their attendants in waiting. Their Serene Highnesses Prince Frederick of Holstein and Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar also attended the Drawingroom.

The Ambassadors and Ministers were first introduced, and then the general circle.

The Queen wore a train of black silk, trimmed with ruches of crape and bunches of black flowers, made in feathers; the body ornamented with diamonds. The petticoat is of black silk; with a tunic of black crape, and bunches of black flowers in feathers. A diadem of diamonds and opals, with black feathers, formed her Majesty's head-dress.

The Princess Royal wore a train of white glacé silk, trimmed with crape and bugles. Petticoat of the same material, and trimmed to correspond. Ornaments, pearls. A wreath of white flowers formed her Royal Highness's head-dress.

The Princess Mary of Cambridge wore a train of bleeh glacé silk, trimmed with crape, bugles, and bunches of flowers, and bleeh glacé grass. The body ornamented to match. The petticoat, two skirts of black crape, the upper one trimmed with bouillonnes of crape and black ribbon; the upper skirt richly trimmed with bugles. Pearl neck ace and earrings. Her Royal Highness's head-dress was composed of black feathers, a black tulle veil with jet, and a diamond tiara.

THE STATE BALL.

The Queen gave a State Ball on Wednesday evening, to which were invited the Royal family, illustrious foreign visitors, the whole of the diplomatic corps, the Cabinet Ministers, and the principals of the public departments, with their wives and daughters; the ladies and gentlemen in waiting on the Queen, the Prince, and the members of the Royal family, and a very numerous party of the nobility and gentry; the total invitations amounting to above 1000.

For the occasion the suite of State rooms at Buckingham Palace were opened, comprising the ball and concert room, the promenade-gallery, the approach-gallery, the state dinner-room, the old ball-room, the small one, the white drawing-room, and the picture-gallery. Beautiful and rare shrubs and plants in flower, in great variety, were tastefully arranged in the dinner room and the other apartments, and the large recesses at the ends of the grand staircase were also entirely filled with flowering plants of great beauty.

Her Majesty and his Royal Highness were accompanied to the ball and concert room by her Royal Highness the Princess Royal, his Imperial Highness the Archduke Maximilian of Austria, their Royal Highnesses the Duchess and Princess Mary of Cambridge, Prince Frederick William of Prussia, the Duke of Cambridge, and the Hereditary Prince of Saxe-Meiningen.

The Queen wore a dress of white silk covered with crape, and three tunics of crape trimmed with white fringe and white flowers, with silver-frosted leaves, ornamented with pearls. Her Majesty's head-dress was composed of pearls and white flowers.

The Princess Royal wore a white crape dress over a rich white glacé silk, looped up with bunches of roses. The body and sleeves ornamented with pearls. The head-dress, a wreath of white roses.

The Duchess of Cambridge wore a black crape dress, trimmed with rubies, studded with diamonds. Pearl necklace and earrings. Head-dress, a tiara of pearls and black feathers.

The Princess Mary of Cambridge wore a double skirt of white crape over a rich glacé petticoat. The under skirt was trimmed with bouillonnes and white ribbon; the upper skirt was trimmed with rows of small pearl, silk and crape, and bunches of white acacia; body trimmed with pearls; a stomacher of pearls and diamonds. Head-dress, bunches of white acacia and diamond pins.

Weippert's quadrille band of forty-five performers was stationed in the ball and concert room, and played a selection of quadrilles, waltzes, and galops.

Refreshments were served to the company in the green drawing-room during the evening.

His Imperial Highness the Archduke Maximilian of Austria, attended by Count Zichy, Baron Hadik, Captain Wissiack, Dr. Trogher, and Lord Charles Fitzroy, went on Wednesday morning to the Crystal Palace at Sydenham. His Imperial Highness returned to Buckingham Palace shortly before two o'clock in the afternoon, and afterwards paid visits to her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent and the other members of the Royal family, at their residences, and took leave of their Royal Highnesses, on his departure for the Continent.

His Royal Highness Prince Frederick William of Prussia honoured the Prussian Minister and Countess Bernstorff with his presence on Thursday evening, at Prussia House. A brilliant circle of the haut ton were invited to meet his Royal Hig ness.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

More Royal visitors. The Duke and Duchess of Montpensier (whose names remind Europe of a stroke of what was called policy on the part of King Louis Philippe—policy which conducted its contriver to no better success than is, finally, thanks to the justice of Providence, allotted to most wicked contrivances) have arrived among us. Her Majesty continues to hold public receptions, and in every way to endeavour to make the season as useful as possible to those classes of her subjects who expected to suffer by the Parliamentary interregnum. The most graceful ceremonial of the year, the distribution of the Order of Merit, on Friday, has naturally excited the utmost interest in all classes; and the new Chevaliers de Bronze are envied by their less fortunate, because less adventurous, brethren in arms. The ceremony has commanded the respectful attention of every party, the spiteful peacemongers excepted.

The Lords have passed the Divorce Bill; several attempts to make it less valuable than it is having been defeated by large majorities, and the Bishop of Oxford's final protest against the third reading having produced no effect. It should be observed, however, that, no matter what may be thought of the arguments with which various noblemen, lay and spiritual, have met the measure, it has been discussed fully, gravely, and fairly, and with a due sense of its importance. The manipulation which it has undergone at the hands of the first lawyers in the kingdom will probably compel its respectful treatment at the hands of the "rising barristers" in the Commons; and, the question of principle having been considered in that House in previous Sessions, there seems no reason for any great delay in passing the bill. Government was less fortunate in the debate on the second reading of the Ministers' Money Bill in the Lords; the Earl of Derby (with a pleasing forgetfulness that he was an uncompromising Church reformer a few years ago) having attacked the measure with all his might, and having a majority of Peers with him. He was repulsed by the aid of proxies, but only by five, and the majority was so small that some people incline to think the Conservative Lords had no intention of beating the Government, or they could have brought up at least five additional votes known to be at hand. The same night the Government was actually outnumbered in the Commons on the question of the National Survey, and the map so coveted by landed proprietors, especially in Scotland—being constructed on the twenty-six inch scale, was prohibited by the House. Government had intended to ask for £50,000 to help the inhabitants of the Finsbury district to a park, much needed by the dwellers in that crowded, and in parts very unhealthy, locality; but the metropolitan representatives of districts that have got their parks organised an opposition, of which Mr. Williams, of Lambeth (the most narrow-minded man in the House), was the mouthpiece, and the cuckoo cry against general taxation for metropolitan improvement prevailed. Mr. Williams had previously added to his notoriety by resisting a demand for money to keep Hampton Court—the delight of millions of the humbler classes—in repair. A constituency that twice returns such a representative has really established no bad claim to a place in Schedule A of the Reform Bill of 1868.

The Oaths Bill has been made somewhat more palatable to the House of Lords by the introduction, with Government sanction, of clauses interdicting Jews from holding the office of guardians or justices of the United Kingdom, or Regents, or Chancellor, or Keeper, or Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, or any office in an Ecclesiastical Court. The logic of such clauses is not very transparent. It is possible to comprehend the argument of those who are willing to permit the Hebrew to execute the law, but refuse to intrust him with the making it; but why the Commons, inviting the Jew to aid in law-making, should forbid him to act as the creature and mere executant of law, is one of those puzzles which meet one at every turn in the history of the Hebrew emancipation. Those who affect to be well informed upon the subject allege that the Lords do not intend to be pacified with this bit of exclusion; and that the division on Ministers' Money indicates what, when a dearer and safer bit of bigotry is to be tried, the Conservative Peerage can do. As Lord Palmerston will not resign should the bill be rejected, Lord Derby, in defeating it, will not be exposed to his one dreaded danger—the chance of having to make a Ministry out of Malmesburys, Disraelis, Henleys, and Newdegates. A man who has to make bricks with such straw should have more sympathy for the descendants of those who had, perhaps, the easier task of making bricks without any straw at all.

Prince Albert's admirable speech at the opening of the Educational Conference will be read with real gratification. Is is indeed a new era when a Prince Consort, husband of the first Sovereign in the world, attends a public meeting to enunciate sentiments like those delivered by his Royal Highness on Monday. He rightly and simply pointed out that the one course for all of us, whatever be our separate views on education, is to do our utmost to create an irresistible public feeling in favour of education itself, the necessity for which is languidly admitted, rather than earnestly felt, by thousands, before whose eyes, nevertheless, come, day after day, the most overwhelming proofs of the deficiency of our social system in this one grand essential and element of healthy life.

Various trials have shown vice its own image in various mirrors. In a gambling case, or rather one in which a young man had been the victim of swindling, the jury gave him a verdict for £0530, which we shall be exceedingly happy to hear he has received. The Prince of Wales was present during the trial. Nearly the last, we hope, of the disgusting actions in which a hundred sues for money in recompense for the loss of his wife's affections and character has also been tried. The case was not one calling for strong language in reference to the defendant, but it had one remarkable feature—by consent of counsel written evidence was taken, and the name of "a distinguished personage" was suppressed. H.R.H. the Duke in question was in no way implicated, and his character and manliness set him far above the necessity of any such management, which one may suppose was a lawyer's device. The law, as expounded by five Judges, has decided that a woman who exposes her child does not commit an assault upon it, and the conviction of a woman who took this method of getting rid of her infant has been solemnly quashed. The existence of an east-end colony of Chinese, who beg all day and debauch all night, has been established, and ladies who are so exceedingly fond of dropping papers of half-pence into the hands of the copper coloured rascals who infest our thoroughfares should know that the indolently-conferred money—no charity is spent in vice of which they would shudder to hear—a remark which applies to the majority of promiscuous almsgiving, now that mendicity has become one of the best London trades.

The Woolwich Artisans.—A large body of emigrants, composed of artisans formerly employed at Woolwich and thereabouts, left Paddington by the 10 o'clock train on Friday morning last, en route for Liverpool, where they were to embark on board the steamship Henry Cooke, which had been chartered for the purpose. The total number of emigrants was 370, all of whom are provided with railway tickets, which will enable them to travel to Toronto, where work will be provided for them.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

Lord Londesborough's sale of yearlings may be set down as successful, as the seven averaged 120 gs., and the five West Australians of the lot 153 gs. Ticket of Leave, a stout chesnut colt by the latter horse, and a daughter of Stockwell and Rataplan, whom, in some points, he considerably resembles, went for 350 gs. into William Oates's stable. The Epaulette filly, after some strong competition with Mr. Saxon, fell to the Marquis Conyngham for 245 gs; the Ennui filly, which was rather light-timbered, but far the most blood-like of the lot, was bought by Boyce of Epsom for 60 gs.; and a very promising colt, Tasso, by Oiaudo, went for only 27 gs., owing perhaps, to his engagements, the half-forfeits for which, after all, did not reach £100. Such are the uncertainties of horse-flesh. The stock of "the West" are well grown and handsome, but rather disposed to be leggy, and weak in that point as well. General Peel's Messenger, who seems likely to race no more, fetched 115 gs.. and his Pyrrhus the First yearling, Precursor, 210 gs. It was rumoured, we know not how correctly, that Mr Sutton had resold the latter.

The Carlisle Meeting comes off on Tuesday and Wednesday, and the Cumberland Plate has 24 acceptances. The Chelmsford also stands for the same days; and Worcester—which is now under the able management of Mr. Webb, of "Wrestler, Wicked Eye, and War Eagle" celebrity—for Thursday and Friday. Mr. Jackson's Buckthorn colt was much fitter at Newcastle than at Newton, and he and Saunterer were both the easiest of winners. The latter seems likely, now that he is kept in regular work, to eat down nearly everything in the north, as his speed and staying powers for two miles are both undeniable. Honeystick, the first of that odd-looking animal Honeywood's stock, won the Tyro cleverly; but the Ascot Cup winner just failed by a head to give the 14lb. to Underhand in the Northumberland Plate, and the two were a couple of lengths in advance of everything else. It is said that Skirmisher is believed by the stable, who are rarely wrong, to be 10 lb. worse than Ignoramus, which ought to be a good enough form for the latter to win the St. Leger with. Blink Bonny is no great Doncaster favourite at present, and it is rumoured that she is in foal. There are forty-five acceptances for the Goodwood Stakes, and some inquiries at 10 to 1 after the American horses for the Cup, for which Fazzoletto, if the ground is pretty soft, bids fair to be the principal English heavy-weight champion.

Mr. Lowndes's negotiation for the Cottesmore country has, we hear, gone off, and thus the Tilton and Oweston Wood fixtures are still in prospective security, and thirty surplus couples of Mr. Lowndes's present Atherstone pack in the market. Charles Barwick, who was first whip to Mr. Lowndes with the Atherstone last season, is to be huntsman to Mr Arkwright with the Essex; and Humphrey Neale goes to the Cambridgeshire from the Ledbury, which the master (Mr. Tinckwell) will probably hunt himself.

On Monday the All England eleven play twenty-two of Loughborough, and sixteen of the University of Oxford the United All England eleven, at Lord's; while on Thursday the Marylebone Club and ground meet Hailebury (with one player), at the same spot. On the latter day the Gentlemen of England are matched against the Players, at the Oval; and on Thursday and Friday the Gentlemen of Hampshire v. the Gentlemen of Sussex issue is to be tried, at Brighton.

The City, Temple, and Strand Regatta is fixed for Monday; the London Model Yacht Club First class Sailing Match (from Greenwich to Oven's Buoy and back to Erith), the Leander Club Oars Match (from Westminster to Putney), and the Royal Hurwich Yacht Club Regatta for Tuesday; the Royal Thames Yacht Club Regatta for Tuesday and Wednesday, the Kingston-on-Thames Royal Regatta for Wednesday and Thursday, and the Royal London Yacht Club Sailing Match for Third-class Yachts (from Erith to Coal House Point and back to Greenwich) for Thursday.

Cricket.—The match of the Marylebone Club and Ground v. University of Oxford was played on Thursday and Friday last week, on the Magdalen Ground, Oxford. Both sides exhibited some fine play, and good scores were made, but the match was ultimately drawn, the score standing as follows: M.C.C. and Ground, first innings, 211; second, 148 total, 349 Oxford, first innings, 212.—The match of the Etonians v. the Marylebone was played on Saturday last, in the Shooting-fields, Eton College, and ended in the Etonians gaining an easy victory. The following is the score: Marylebone, first innings, 75; second, 72: total, 147. Etonians, first innings, 187.—On Monday and Tuesday Lord's Ground was crowded with visitors, including many of rank and fashion, to witness a match played on both sides in first-rate style between sixteen gentlemen of the University of Cambridge and the United All England eleven The "United" were the victors, with two wickets to go down the score running thus: The Cambridge, first innings, 128; second, 46 total, 174. The United," first innings, 92; second, 85: total, 177.—After three days' contest on the Broughton Ground, Manchester, the match of All England eleven v. twenty-two of Broughton was brought to a conclusion on Saturday last, in favour of the eleven, they winning in one innings, with 45 runs over. The following is the score:—All England, first innings, 241; Broughton, first innings, 101; second, 95.

The members of the Junior United Service Club were honoured by the company of his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, on Monday evening, at a splendid banquet, on the inauguration of their palatial clubhouse, in Charles-street, Waterloo-place. Covers were laid for 130 persons.

Microscopic Soirée to the Poor.—On Wednesday evening, the 19th inst., a number of microscopes were exhibited to the children attending the St. Botolph, Aldersgate, Sunday and Day Schools, at the Schoolhouse in Charterhouse-square, by a number of members of a Microscopic Society, who, with a liberality and kindness of the highest commendation thus afforded their poorer neighbours an intellectual treat of a description never before given them. The entertainment was very successfully attended and all amounting to nearly 800, including visitors, were highly gratified. The entertainment was initiated by Mr Walliford, surgeon, Aldersgate-street.

Wesleyan Methodism. The present position of the Wesleyan Society, with the exception of the North Wales district, from which no return has been received, is as follows:—There are in society 381,731 members; and 17,415 are on trial. Deducting the decrease in some places, 6,8—from the increase in others—3325—there appears to have been a gain by the cause of 6314 new members.

The office for the sale of tickets for the forthcoming performances in remembrance of the late Mr Jerrold was opened on Tuesday. The applications for tickets were most numerous, and during the day upwards of £130 was received.

The University of Heidelberg has just lost by death a student who passed for being the senior university student in Europe. He was 71 years of age, had lived celibate, and could never be induced to quit the university—to him a true alma mater.

DISTRIBUTION OF THE VICTORIA CROSS BY HER MAJESTY, IN HYDE PARK.

OFFICIAL ARRANGEMENTS.

Horse Guards, June 23, 1857.

Infantry parade to be formed at nine o'clock on Friday: cavalry and artillery at a quarter past nine o'clock; in line of contiguous columns, right in front, and at quarter distance, in the following order 1. Rifle Artillery. 2 Life Guards 3 Dragoons. 4. Royal Engineers 5 Foot Guards. 6. Royal Marines. 7. 79th Highlanders. 8. Rifle Brigade. 9 Artillery. 10 Military Train

The boys of the Royal Military Asylum and the Pensioners will form on the left of the line and in front of the Military Train

Officers and men to receive the Victoria Cross will form in line near the Centre Pavilion

On the Queen entering at Hyde Park-corner gate a Royal salute to be fired by the batteries on the left of the line

When the Queen has taken post in the centre the recipients to pass individually, each presenting his card to the Adjutant-General, who will name them to her Majesty. After passing, they will resume their original position.

After the distribution of the Crosses the troops will march past in succession, the Rifle Artillery in quick time, the infantry in slow time at open order, the Rifle distance between troops and companies, and 1-5 of a pace at a trot; infantry in quick time officers in command of companies and Brigade-majors will salute the Queen as they pass. The officers and infantry will then resume their original position.

The Artillery and Horse Artillery, after passing in review distance, will countermarch by troops, and repass the Queen at a canter when they front to rear, when at a given signal to their respective original positions, and re-forming at open order on their original ground.

The staff and general officers composing the Queen's cortège will form in front of, and facing, her Majesty, those preceding her Majesty on the proper left, and those following on the right, at the distance of the front of the columns, taking care to be well clear of the flanks

Horse Guards, June 25, 1857.

The officers who are to receive the Victoria Cross from her Majesty will assemble in Hyde Park opposite Grosvenor-gate, at nine o'clock on Friday, the 26th inst., and place themselves under the orders of Lieut.-General Sir Colin Campbell

The privates who are to receive the same distinguished honour will assemble at Portman street Barracks, and march thence at half-past eight o'clock, under the command of Lieutenant John Knox, Rifle Brigade, himself the only Victoria Cross officer who has lost a limb through his gallantry.

ADDITIONAL RECIPIENTS

The Queen has been graciously pleased to signify her intention to confer the decoration of the Victoria Cross on the undermentioned officers, non-commissioned officer, and men of her Majesty's army, who have been recommended to her Majesty for that decoration.—

Private Thomas Grady, 4th Regiment For having, on the 18th October, 1854, volunteered to repair the embrasures of the Sailors' battery on the Left Attack, and effected the same, with the assistance of one other volunteer, under a very heavy fire from a line of batteries For distinguished conduct on the 22nd November, 1854, in the repulse of the Russian attack on the advanced trench of the Left Attack, when, on being severely wounded, he refused to quit the front; encouraging, by such determined bearing, the weak force engaged with the enemy to maintain its position.

Private Samuel Evans, 19th Regiment—For volunteering to go into an embrasure, thereby rendering very great assistance in repairing damage, under a very heavy fire from the enemy. 13th April, 1855.

Colonel Collingwood Dickson, C.B., Royal Artillery For having, on the 17th of October, 1854, when the batteries of the Right Attack had run short of powder, displayed the greatest coolness and contempt of danger, in directing the unloading of several waggons of the Field Battery, which were brought up to the trenches to supply the want; and having personally assisted in carrying the powder-barrels under a severe fire from the enemy

Captain Gronow Davis, Royal Artillery—For great coolness and gallantry in the attack on the Redan, 8th September. 1855 on which occasion he commanded the spiking party; and after which he saved the life of Lieutenant Sanders, 30th Regiment, by jumping over the parapet of a ditch, and proceeding twice some distance across the open, under a "murderous" fire to assist in conveying that officer, whose leg was broken, and who was otherwise severely wounded, under cover; and repeated this act in the conveyance of other wounded soldiers from the same exposed position.

Sergeant Daniel Cambridge, Royal Artillery For having volunteered for the spiking party at the assault on the Redan, 8th September, 1855, and continuing therewith after being severely wounded; and for having, in the after part of the same day, gone out in front of the advanced trench, under a heavy fire, to bring in a wounded man; in performing which service he was himself severely wounded a second time.

We have reason to believe that her Majesty and the Prince took great interest in the design of this new Order of Valour, and the Cross was adopted upon their entire approval. It is made of gun-metal, from cannon taken at Sebastopol, which was sent from the Royal Arsenal at Woolwich to Mr Hancock, of Bruton-street, by whom the Cross was designed and executed.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

A general parade of the officers and troops belonging to the Provisional Battalion at Chatham garrison took place on the Lines on Monday afternoon, when the entire battalion was drawn up, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel C. N. Phillips, for the purpose of witnessing the presentation of a silver medal, with a gratuity of £5, which had been awarded by the Duke of Cambridge to Private John Prendergrast, 87th Royal Irish Fusiliers, for long service and meritorious conduct while serving with his regiment in India, whence he has recently returned. The order was from his Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief having been read to the assembled troops, Private Prendergrast was called to the front, when the Colonel presented him with the medal in an appropriate speech.

Some interesting trials of much importance to the naval service took place last week at Woolwich Dockyard with Dr. Brown's patent masthead and paddlebox lamps. On Friday evening at 9.30, one of the lamps was hoisted on the mainmast of the flags-hip Pigmy, displaying a red and blue light, which was easily visible many miles round A service lamp was likewise raised on the Pigmy's mizen-mast at the same time to enable a comparison to be made, and the newly-invented light was pronounced infinitely superior. On Saturday one of the paddlebox lamps was tested in the cellars of the Dockyard smithery. A favourable report has been transmitted to the Admiralty of the Admiralty setting forth the advantages of the newly-invented lamp

The annual inspection of the Plymouth Division of the Royal Marine Light Infantry took place on Monday last before the Major-General commanding the south-western district, and Colonel Wesley, Deputy Adjutant-General of the corps. The division numbers upwards of 1100 of all ranks. All the evolutions (principally light infantry were performed in an extraordinary manner, and elicited well-deserved commendation. During the day a close inspection was made of the barrack-rooms, infirmary, schools, divisional books, &c., with the whole of which the Major-General and the Deputy Adjutant-General expressed themselves much pleased

The 88th Regiment left Aldershott on Thursday morning for Portsmouth, to await transports to convey them to Calcutta. They will embark about the 8th of July; and, previously to their embarkation, will be presented with new colours. The old colours, which accompanied the regiment throughout the Crimea, are to be placed in Gawsworth Church, so that the principal town of Connaught may contain a memorial of the achievements of the famous regiment whose gallant career forms one of the proudest associations of the province with which it is identified.

Regimental Schools.—A general order, calling the attention of officers to the condition of their regimental schools has just been issued by his Royal Highness the General Commanding-in-Chief, in which it is stated that it is scarcely less essential to the soldier to be able to read and write, and keep his own accounts, than to be acquainted with his drill, as without these elementary acquirements no soldier is capable of profiting by the instruction given him in the use of the rifled musket his promotion is rendered comparatively hopeless, and he is deprived of the interest and improvement derivable from the excellent libraries now formed within his reach. For the future every soldier, after being dismissed from drill, is to attend school for reading and writing, until he is reported upon as sufficiently advanced in reading, writing and arithmetic. No fees are to be required for this attendance at school. The men are to have, if possible, at least four hours' attendance each week. No man is to be considered eligible for promotion to corporal, unless in the field, who has not been dismissed the above class for promotion to the rank of sergeant higher qualifications are expected. Pains are to be taken to point out to all the attention of common drill officers is particularly called to the importance of carrying the education of non-commissioned officers to a higher point than the mere acquisition of the arts of reading and writing. Those men who avail themselves most intelligently of the means of improvement within their reach are to be generally preferred for promotion, where, in respect to conduct and soldierlike bearing they are eligible for it; and neglect so to do is to be regarded as a disqualification.

The Lieutenant-Governor of the Garrison at Portsmouth, Major-General Breton, has received the appointment of Governor and Commander-in-Chief of the Mauritius. The pay attached to the office is £6000 per annum.

TOWN AND TABLE TALK ON LITERATURE, ART, &c.

"WHEN found, make a note of." Lord Chief Justice Campbell and Alderman Sir Peter Laurie both love facts—both are Scotchmen—both were in the habit of meeting an illustrious painter, now no more. Plain John Campbell knew Wilkie—at and away from Cults; plain Peter Laurie knew Wilkie at Kensington, at his own and at Wilkie's table. It seems impossible to suppose that Lord Campbell could be misinformed about any public fact of moment in the life of Wilkie's friend. But Lord Campbell can write at times in utter ignorance of facts, and Lend a lie the confidence of truth.

To what extent of error his Lordship will occasionally run, take this passage (pretty public, we believe, though not hitherto in print) from his Lordship's recently-published "Lie of Lord Chief Justice Tenterden :"—

Tenterden was courteous in company, but rather stiff and formal in his manners, as if afraid of familiarity and requiring the protection of dignified station which probably arose from the recollection of his origin and of his boyish days. He would voluntarily refer to these among very intimate friends, but he became exceedingly uneasy when he apprehended any allusion to them in public. Once, however, he was complimented upon his rise under circumstances so extravagantly ludicrous that he joined in the general shout of laughter which the orator called forth. Sir Peter Laurie, the saddler, when Lord Mayor of London, gave a dinner at the Mansion House to the Judges, and, in proposing their health, observed, in impassioned accents, "What a country is this we live in! In other parts of the world there is no chance, except for men of high birth and aristocratic connections; but here genius and industry are sure to be rewarded. See before you the examples of myself, the Chief Magistrate of the metropolis of this great empire, and the Chief Justice of England sitting at my right hand—both now in the highest offices in the State, and both sprung from the very dregs of the people!"

Weigh every word well—mark the impassioned accents—and the circumstances so extravagantly ludicrous; then reflect, passing by for a moment, as it were, that his Lordship was once a reporter, and then be prepared to learn that the whole story is not even what Dryden calls a sophisticated truth with an alloy of lie in it—that the speech said to have been spoken never was spoken—that the parallel said to have been drawn never was drawn—and then receive this one fact, that when Alderman Sir Peter Laurie was Lord Mayor of London Lord Chief Justice Tenterden—was in his grave.

Lives by great men misinform us. Surely Lord Campbell and Mrs. Gaskell might be heard in court one against the other—certainly in the same cause. But Lord Campbell has done the handsome thing by Sir Peter. The Lord Chief Justice owns he is wrong, and he apologises. Tenterden would not have made a mistake of this kind. But for Lord Campbell's errors in life-writing ask Mr. Foss, ask Mr. Spedding—excellent authorities not to be omitted "properly" when passing judgment on lives by Hale's successor.

Are we to have a life of Mr. Jerrold? Two or three Richards are in the field, it is said, claiming a monopoly of life-writing on their deceased friend. Who is to write it? We remember hearing Mr. Moore (Tom Moore) urging a monopoly in the life-writing of Sydney Smith. We remember, on the same occasion, Mr. Rogers (Sam Rogers) knocking down "Erin's bard," and proving that Moore was unfit (as unfit he was) to render justice to the great Sydney. We have not much confidence in the fitness of any one person to write Mr. Jerrold's life. Why, when the beautiful burial service for the dead is still in its last accents in our ears, and still moistening our eyes, should we be troubled with a three-volume life? It is easy to note that men who live too near to, or too distant from, their heroes are likely to fall into fearful errors. Ask Lord Campbell.

We are glad to observe that Lord Methuen still possesses the famous Cerabam pictures. The belief prevalent in artistic circles was that his Lordship had parted with them, and in this belief Dr. Waagen cancelled his account of them from the last edition of "Art-Treasures in England." The Vandyke full-length of the Duke of Richmond with a dog is a picture of which any collection might be proud; but the so-called Mabuse of "The Three Children of Henry VII." is inferior to the Hampton Court and Wilton pictures of the same children, at the same ages, and in the same attitudes. We have seen all three within the last ten days, and are of opinion that the Hampton Court picture is the original.

Mr. Wornum has just put forth, price sixpence, a capital catalogue, descriptive and historical of the "Examples of the British School of Art in the National Gallery." The collection consists of some three hundred and nine pictures, of which three hundred are bequests or donations, and the odd nine purchases. Will it be believed that since the foundation of the National Gallery in 1824, when nine English pictures were acquired with the Angerstein collection, the nation has not bought a single specimen of the English school? And when such donations we still grudge a National Gallery. Is that true, my Lord Broughton?

Some of our contemporaries assure us that Mr. Croker is restored to health. We wish, indeed, that we could confirm their statement. He who writes this had the pleasure of conversing with Mr. Croker only a few days ago. His mind was bright and clear; his sarcastic eyes nearly as fine as we remember them many years ago; and his recollection of bygone times perfectly marvellous.

From a protest of Sir Charles Barry against the decision of the Treasury on his claims for remuneration as architect of the new Houses of Parliament, we learn that the building has been in progress nearly twenty years, covers more than eight acres of ground, and contains above 1180 rooms, 10 halls, 136 staircases, and more than two miles of corridors, passages, &c.

It is stated in the Edinburgh Witness that Government has been pleased to mark its sense of the services rendered to literature and science by the late Hugh Miller by bestowing upon his widow an annuity of £70.

BAPTISM OF THE PRINCESS BEATRICE.—It may be interesting to record that the water employed in this christening, on Tuesday week, was brought from the river Jordan, and presented to her Majesty for the occasion. It appears that Captain Geoffrey Nightingale, Hyderabad Cavalry, when travelling some time since in the Holy Land, visited the river Jordan, and had some of the water put into bottles, which, being hermetically sealed, the Captain brought to England; and, upon the birth of the Princess Beatrice, he placed at the disposal of the Queen a quantity of the water sufficient for the baptismal ceremony. Captain Nightingale's offer was accepted by her Majesty, and the Jordan water was accordingly placed in the Royal font, and used in the ceremony.

BAYONET MACHINERY.—His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge on his recent visit to Birmingham, inspected the arms-works of Mr. Charles Reeves, Charlotte street, where he spent a considerable time in witnessing the different processes of manufacture of swords, bayonets, military ornaments, and buttons. His Royal Highness heard with great apparent interest the explanations given to him by the principal, and asked many questions relative to these branches of manufacture. This establishment having turned out during the war the largest number of bayonets of any works in the kingdom, the patent machinery for making the blades so quickly elicited the approbation of his Royal Highness, and in his presence ten blades were made in five minutes.

PRIZE GLEES.—The Abbey Glee Club prizes for the three best glees were on Monday last awarded to Messrs. Smith, Coward and Martin. The last-named gentleman, it will be recollected, has succeeded on several successive occasions in carrying off the Glee Club prize of twenty guineas.

MUSIC.

THE company of HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE has received a valuable addition in the person of M. Belart, a tenor, who made his first appearance on Tuesday evening in the character of Elcino in the "Sonnambula," with complete success. His voice is of the true Spanish quality, and holds the first situation of principal tenor at the Royal Opera, Madrid. He is a young man, scarcely of the heroic stature, but well made, with handsome, intelligent features, and his action is animated and easy. His voice is excellent, and his style of singing bespeaks the accomplished artist. He was warmly applauded throughout the piece, and his principal air, "Ah, perchè non posso odiarti," was loudly encored. Alboni was the Amina. She certainly does not look the part of the young rustic maiden; but she acts with feeling, and, in her singing of the music, leaves every competitor far behind. Her 'Ah, non giunge," was a marvellous display of brilliant execution, chastened by the purest taste, and finely in keeping with the rapturous joy expressed by the song. Alboni is the very beau ideal of a finished, perfect, Italian singer.

AT the ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, Mdlle. Victoire Balfe was to have appeared on Thursday in her second character, Lucia, but it was considered expedient to give her a little further time for more complete preparation, and she will perform the above part, we believe, on Thursday next. In the meantime she repeated Amina, the part in which she has gained her earliest laurels.

AN excellent concert was given at the Hanover-square Rooms on Monday morning, by the eminent composer and violinist, Herr Jansa. The programme was full of interesting matter. A quartet for two violins, viola, and violoncello, composed by Herr Jansa, was performed by him, along with Messrs. Carrodus, Schrarus, and Piatti—a masterly and beautiful work, which delighted the large and highly-musical audience. Another piece of his own—a concert-stück for two violins, viola, and violoncello, with orchestral accompaniments—likewise received the warmest applause. Among other instrumental pieces of a classical character was Beethoven's sonata for the pianoforte and violin, Op. 47 (commonly called the "Kreutzer Sonata"), played in perfection by Herr Pauer and Herr Jansa. A fine motetto, "Ave Mpria," composed by Herr Jansa for the Imperial Chapel at Vienna, was performed by the full band and chorus. His was assisted by Madame Rudersdorff, Herr von der Osten, M. Billet, Herr Engel, and Signor Regondi; and the concert was as successful as it was admirable. Herr Jansa was long the Kapelmeister of the Austrian Emperor's chapel at Vienna; but, having, when on a visit to London a few years ago, committed the crime of getting up a concert for the Hungarian refugees, he was deprived of his office at Vienna, and forced to remain in exile. Happily, however, the English public have discovered and appreciated his distinguished talents.

THE VOCAL UNION, a society formed last year for the performance of English glees and madrigals, began their second season (somewhat tardily) by a concert at the Hanover-square Rooms on Wednesday morning. The members are Miss Marian Moss, Mr. Foster, Mr. Wilbye Cooper, Mr. Montem Smith, Mr. Winn, and Mr. Thomas—all eminent in their profession, and distinguished as excellent glee singers. The concert consisted of glees and madrigals selected from the works of Elliot, Battishill, Goss, Horsley, and other composers. The room was crowded, and the audience listened with great delight to those fine specimens of our English vocal harmony, which is not surpassed in any country in the world.

MR. BENEDICT'S second concert at Her Majesty's Theatre took place on Wednesday morning. It was on the same grand scale as the last, the whole vocal and instrumental strength of the establishment being put in requisition. There was a selection from the celebrated "Orfeo" of Gluck, including several of the choruses, and the air "Che farò senza Euridice," most exquisitely sung by Alboni. The finale to the first act of "Don Giovanni" was performed, with scenery, costumes, and dramatic action. Among the miscellaneous pieces was Balfe's air, "I dreamt that I dwelt in marble halls," sung by Mdlle. Piccolomini, in English, and with a purity of elocution and beauty of voice and execution which delighted the audience.

ON Wednesday evening Mr. HULLAH terminated, for the season, his series of concerts at St. Martin's Hall. As at all the previous concerts, the hall was crowded; and an interesting concert of sacred and secular music was received with great applause.

WE perceive that Madame Bassano is to give a Herr Kuhe's annual morning concert is to be given on Monday next, at the Hanover-square Rooms. The programme contains the names of Mme. Clara Novello, Mdlle. de Wexterehoud (the new Swedish nightingale), Lefort, Reichardt, Sims Reeves, and a host of other celebrities.

THE THEATRES, &c.

PRINCESS'.—On Monday Mr. Charles Kean took his annual benefit at this theatre, the tragedy of "Richard II." being performed before a fashionable and numerous audience. The next great Shakspearean revival promised is "The Tempest," which will be performed next Wednesday.

LYCEUM.—On Wednesday an interesting experiment was made on these boards by Madame Ristori and the Italian company—an Italian translation of an English tragedy was successfully performed. The drama selected for this distinguished honour was Dr. Milman's "Fazio," the translator being Signor F. Dall' Ongaro, who, though he had not been able to render all the phrases of the original, has produced an effective version, and has even added a point or two remarkably telling for the actress also. Considerable curiosity prevailed, of course, to see how the great Italian tragédienne would succeed in this character, after Miss O'Neill, Miss Cushman, and Miss Glyn, all of whom have won laurels by its impersonation. "Fazio" is not generally regarded as a good acting play, and the manner in which it is commonly treated on the English stage is not at all commendable. Poor Fazio himself, and the guilty Aldabella in particular (with the exception of her first representative, Mrs. Faucit), are too often rendered carelessly and grudgingly, as parts of which their representatives are ashamed—seldom and not embrace. Very different was the case with these Italian performers. Signor Vitaliani really made an interesting part of Fazio, which he supported with wonderful elaboration and detail; and Mdlle. Ferroni threw considerable energy, dignity, and earnestness into the part of the perplexed, into the Marchesa. But, of course, the great feature was Ristori herself. The acting qualities of the first act are greatly improved by its reduction to one scene, which is managed by the interpolation of a soliloquy added to the part of Bianca, during the absence of Fazio while disposing of old Bartolo's body and property. In the discovery of Fazio having met with Aldabella, in the second act, Madame Ristori made the usual point; and it is not until the third act that any marked difference comes in her style of portraying the character. Here she rose at once into force and fervour, and the tide of passion and emotion set in, to know no ebb, until after the final fall of the curtain. The prison scenes were, in particular, pathetically interpreted; and the whole of the business regarding her final parting with the husband whom in her jealousy she had accused and brought to execution, may be pronounced to be decidedly new and exceedingly beautiful. The cataleptic fit is undergone in a reclining posture; and, when her husband has taken leave of the almost prostrate and unconscious form, her slow recovery and exit afford new phases of performance of the most astonishing. They should be seen, to comprehend the triumphant performance of this tragedy in a foreign tongue is a grateful vindication of English genius; and none could have retired from the performance of "Fazio" on Wednesday without feeling that he had formed a higher estimate of the drama than he had previously entertained. The appointments of the piece are very satisfactory: the banquet scene that concludes it is indeed most elegantly contrived. Some measures, however, should be taken to prevent the immoderate intervals that produce so much weariness between the acts.

ADELPHI.—Mr. and Mrs. Barney Williams have reappeared at this theatre, during Mr. Webster's absence in the provinces, and have performed their favourite parts in "Ireland as It Is" with their usual success.

ROYAL AMPHITHEATRE, LIVERPOOL.—On Monday night Mr. B. Webster, Mr. Wright, and Mr. Paul Bedford appeared at this theatre together for the first time, we believe, in Liverpool. The house was well filled, and each of the principal performers received an enthusiastic greeting. The performance for the night was "Janet Pride." About a year since "Janet Pride" was produced in Liverpool, with Mr. Webster as the leading character; but, on the present occasion, the appearance of Mr. Paul Bedford as Black Jack, and Mr. Wright as Dicked Trotter, formed a most valuable addition. Mr. Webster's true natural acting painfully life-like in every look gesture, and word—was warmly appreciated throughout. Mr. Bedford as the honest Cockney apprentice. Miss Page played Janet very cleverly, Mr. Wright and Mr. Bedford afterwards appeared in a "screaming" Lyre called "The Terrible Tragedy in Seven Dials,"

DUDLEY GALLERY, EGYPTIAN HALL.—Mr. and Mrs. Webb, coloured natives of Philadelphia, appeared on Wednesday afternoon in a new entertainment, entitled "The Linfor Studio." The room was frequented by a fashionable audience, who seemed to appreciate highly the various characters which Mrs. Webb impersonated. Among these were le Prophète, Othello, and Rolla, en costume. These were decidedly well done, and gave to the first part peculiar importance. The second is more miscellaneous and original, and designed for the exhibition of humour and singing, in which the burden is borne by Mrs. Webb, who must be reported as having sustained her claim for the possession of more than ordinary talent. The entertainment merits encouragement.

The range of temperature during the week was 39·4 deg.

Sheet lightning was seen on the night of the 19th, shortly after midnight, and a heavy storm occurred on the following morning between 1h. and 3h., when the lightning was accompanied with loud thunder, and rain was falling heavily. It was again raining heavily on the night of the 20th. A splendid meteor was perceived in the N.N.W. at 9h. 40m. p.m. of the 23rd, which was visible for a few seconds, and burst into fragments as it approached the horizon. A dense mist suddenly came over on the early morning of the 18th.

The sky was much overcast during the nights between June 18 and 21, but has since continued very clear.

June 2nd.—Rain-Gauge out of order.

ERRATUM.—June 15. Barometer. For 29·035, read 29·935.

The daily means are obtained from observations made at 6h. and 10h. a.m., and 2h., 6h., and 10h. p.m., on each day, except Sunday, when the first observation is omitted. The corrections for diurnal variation are taken from the Tables of Mr Glaisher The "Dew-point" and "Relative Humidity" are calculated, from observations of the dry and wet bulb thermometers, by Dr. Apjohn's Formula and Dalton's Table of the Tension of Vapour. The movement of the wind is given by a self-recording Robinson's Anemometer, the amount stated for each day being that registered from midnight to midnight.

CHESTERFIELD NEW MARKET HALL.

MOST travellers who have journeyed northwards by the line of railway branching from the London and North-western system at Rugby, in the direction of the Yorkshire district, will doubtlessly readily call to mind the quaint old crooked spire of Chesterfield, seen as they have passed along the valley on the eastern side of the town, which is situated in the middle of an important mineral district, becoming daily more so, as the vast resources of both coal and ironstone find more extensive development from the employment of capital for which there is a wide and, if judiciously managed, a remunerative field. Within the last few years the increase of population in and around the town has been marked and rapid—Duy Cross, Staveley, Whittington, and other places having sprung up into thrifty existence, where some thousands of workmen and miners are employed, and in the various coal, iron, and steel works now in full operation. In consequence of this rapid development, Chesterfield has become a sort of local metropolis, if the term may be used, at which the workmen's wants of the common necessaries of life are supplied, and its weekly market within the last few years has become a busy mart, at which the agriculturists for many miles round have disposed of their produce.

From times of a very early date the market has been held in the large quadrangular square, which had few, if any, equals in the kingdom, its extent being upwards of three acres, situated in the centre of the town, and which has served as cattle, corn, and provision market, each having a locality in this space.

The exposure to all weathers of those attending it has long been felt as exceedingly inconvenient, and several attempts at different times have been made to remedy the evil by the erection of a market-house; but, owing to the fierce opposition, almost unaccountable, met with from landowners and many of the surrounding farmers, all endeavours to form a market company proved abortive till the Session of Parliament in 1854, when, after a sharp and expensive opposition, an act of incorporation was obtained authorising the erection of the building just completed, the works of which were commenced on the 24th February, 1856—a delay of more than a year having taken place, caused by unforeseen legal and other difficulties beyond the company's control.

The building represented by the accompanying Engraving stands nearly in the centre of the present market-square, as above stated, of upwards of three acres in extent; the space inclosed and covered by the edifice being 55 yards Long and 30 wide; in which are included a Corn Exchange, 67 feet long 44 feet wide, and 17 feet high at the western end, and a covered Market in the centre, 94 feet long, 67 feet wide, and 24 feet high, surrounded by shops on the north, south, and east sides, with rooms for private offices above them on the south side, and public rooms and sessions court on the north and east. The principal entrance to the market and to the rooms on the first floor is at the east end of the building; in addition to which two other entrances have been provided, one on the north and one on the south side, as well as a doorway from the Corn Exchange. The Corn Exchange is entered by two doorways, situated on the west and north-west sides of the building. There is also a private staircase on the north-west sides of the hall to the public rooms and private offices. The edifice is constructed of local brick, faced with pressed brick of good colour and quality, blue-ash mortar, with local stone from the Alton and North Edge quarries, in the parish of Ashover, for the cornices, quoins, window dressings, string-courses, faces, &c. The east front is ornamented with a tower, in which provision is made for a clock and bell, about to be raised by a local subscription.

The funds at the disposal of the committee being limited, in consequence of the increased expense of obtaining Parliamentary powers for the establishment of the company, the interior of the building is finished in a plain but substantial manner, at a cost, including the tower, of a little more than £3000. The tower and the whole of the stone dressings were added to the contract after the works had been commenced. The Exchange and General Market are lighted with glass roofs; and ventilation has been provided for both the markets and public rooms, by the use of ventilators patented by Mr. Watson, of Halifax.

On the ground plan of the building are comprised, besides the General and Corn Markets just described, twenty-one shops, varying in length from four to sixteen feet, and ten feet wide, seventeen of which are furnished with a separate cellar, and many of them having mezzanine store-rooms over them for the stowage of goods, refreshment-rooms with kitchen and cellars below, retiring-room for ladies, and a house for the market-keeper, with a weighing-machine office. The first floor provides three rooms for the Mechanics' Institute, viz., a library, reading and committee room; a public news-room, and seven private offices; a magistrates' room, 20 ft. 9 in. square and 14 ft. high; an ante-room; a large room for a sessions court, 70 ft. long, 32 ft. wide, and 27 ft. high, with a retiring-room for ladies. It is proposed to use the large room for balls, concerts, and public entertainments, with which view the ceiling is coved on all sides with a coving of 5 ft. radius, and groined at the our angles of intersection. The tables, benches, and fittings for sessional and magisterial business are all made so as to admit of their being readily moved. The appearance of this room is light and elegant, and, when lit up with the sun-burners fixed in the ceiling, the effect is striking and agreeable. The second floor provides a news-room for the Mechanics' Institute, 21½ feet square and 12 feet high; eight rooms for private offices, a billiard-room, and a small room. Retiring-places are plentifully provided for at different convenient places on the building. The style of the structure is the Roman Italian. Mr. G. Thomson, of Darby, to whom the construction of the building has been confided, has executed the work in a very superior manner.

Messrs. Davies and Son, of Chesterfield, are the architects, whose designs were adopted from a number sent in to the committee in reply to a public advertisement for competition plans.

The General Market was opened for business on the 2nd May, which was commemorated by an inaugural dinner in the large concert-hall on Wednesday last, at which the Hon G. H. Cavendish, M.P. (in the chair), Sir Joseph Paxton, M.P., W. P. Thornhill, Esq., M.P., W. H. De Rodes, Esq., High Sheriff of the county, and most of the leading local gentry and farmers, attended, followed by a ball on Thursday night, which was patronised by a brilliant company, and which passed off with the greatest éclat.

BOMBAY ARTILLERY PLATE.

THE superb Piece of Plate, which is represented, is now on its way to Bombay for presentation to the officers of the Bombay Artillery, from Major-General Frederick Schuler, on his retirement after nearly forty-seven years' service.

General Schuler is an officer of high standing in the Bombay army, and is now holding the second command in that Presidency. The plate is four feet in height, and there are three larger groups upon the plinths, representing the horse, foot, and native artillery, being the three divisions of the regiment. On the column are ribbons (entwined with laurel leaves) bearing the names of all the actions in which the regiment has been engaged. The pillar is surmounted by a figure of Britannia and the Lion. Upon the base are alto-relievos of the citadel of Ghuznee and a troop of horse artillery in action, and the following simple inscription:—

A Memento of Friendship from Major-General Frederick Schuler, Colonel Bombay Artillery, to the Regiment. Presented 1857.

The plate has been designed and manufactured by Messrs. Smith and Nicholson, under the superintendence of some of the officers of the regiment now in England. It is one of the most characteristic groups of plate we remember to have illustrated in our pages.

THE SOUTH KENSINGTON MUSEUM.

THE opening of this new "Department of Science and Art," and the sittings of the Educational Conference, are events of kindred interest in the records of the past week. The latter meeting, exclusive reference to aiding the general education of the poor, was the object of the former is to aid in the diffusion, among the of the community, of those principles of Science and Art which are calculated to advance the industrial interests of the country. In other words, this new department may be regarded as the exponent of the consideration in which Art education at present held by the Government of this country. The Museum was visited by her Majesty and Prince Albert on Saturday evening, when the entire suite of buildings was lighted for the occasion, it being a reconnaissance of

THE "INFLEXIBLE" IN A CYCLONE IN THE SOUTHERN INDIAN OCEAN.

MEMORABLE OCEAN STEAM VOYAGE.

AMONG the remarkable incidents of the progress of the war with China will hereafter be chronicled the voyage of her Majesty's steam sloop-of-war, Inflexible, 6 guns (Commander J. Corbett), and her Majesty's gun-boat Starling (Lieutenant and Commander A. Villiers), on their passage out from England to Hong-Kong.

We have been favoured with the accompanying Sketches by an officer on board the former of these vessels, which left England in company on the 23rd of October last, and arrived together at Hong-Kong on the 25th of March last, the Inflexible having had the Starling actually in tow over 10,000 miles of their course, a greater distance than any one vessel has ever previously towed another across the ocean.

The first Illustration shows the Inflexible in a cyclone in the Southern Indian Ocean, January 31; and the companion Engraving shows the Inflexible and the Starling, on March 13, in a N.E. monsoon in the China Sea, with the Island of Palo Supata in the distance.

THE EXPENSES OF THE CHINESE WAR.—Copies of correspondence with Sir John Bowring on the subject of his application for a vote from Parliament to defray the expenses of measures of precaution and defence at Hong-Kong, required by the state of affairs in China, have been published. It appears that two despatches, respectively dated 28th January, 1857, and 12th March, 1857, were addressed by Sir John Bowring to the Right Hon. H. Labouchere, requesting two separate grants of £10,000 for the above purposes. In reply, Mr. Labouchere states that the Government will ask Parliament for a vote of credit for £10,000 for Hong-Kong, but that the second application cannot be complied with without a more satisfactory explanation of the precise objects towards which the aid is to be applied.

ENORMOUS EXPORT OF SILVER.—The Peninsular and Oriental Company's steamer Pera, Captain Joy, left Southampton on Saturday last with the heavy portion of the fortnightly India and China mail. The mail was a very heavy one. The Pera took out 74 passengers, and specie, chiefly silver, to the amount of nearly a million and a quarter sterling. The bulk of this was taken to Southampton from London by a special train of 17 waggons, and the whole of the specie weighed upwards of eighty tons. Precious metals to so large an amount were never, perhaps, on board a single ship at one time. The export of enormous quantities of silver is exciting the greatest interest, not only on account of the important commercial and political circumstances with which it is connected, but also because of the fortunes which are being made by all those who are merely concerned in its transit, and because of the vast extent of British commerce which it reveals. Nearly 3000 bales of silk arrive in England every fortnight with the overland India and China mail, each bale being worth £[illegible] besides the silk that reaches England in sailing vessels by the long sea route. As much profit as 25 per cent is made by the sale of silver for the East.

THE HANDEL FESTIVAL.

LAST week we gave an account of the progress of this great celebration at the Crystal Palace down to the end of the second day's performances on Wednesday, the 17th inst. On the Friday following the festival terminated with one of Handel's greatest works, "Israel in Egypt," which was given in a style of unparalleled grandeur, and with even greater success than the oratorios of the preceding days. The influx of visitors was immense. While the attendance on the Monday and Wednesday did not exceed twenty-five thousand persons on each day, on Friday the assemblage numbered above seventeen thousand. The congregation of this immense multitude within the area of the Central Transept of the building and in the surrounding galleries, all within sight of the orchestra and within hearing of the music, afforded a spectacle hitherto unequalled in this country.

"Israel in Egypt" is better fitted than either "The Messiah" or "Judas Maccabæus" for performance on so enormous a scale and in so vast a locality. It consists almost wholly of double choruses—choruses, that is to say, for two choirs distinct from and responsive to each other; while the airs and other pieces for solo voices are few and short.

There is no record of the circumstances which attended the composition of "Israel in Egypt," or of the reason which induced Handel to adopt the very peculiar construction of this oratorio. But it is certain that its construction had a most injurious influence on its success during the author's lifetime, and indeed almost down to the present day. It was first produced in 1738; and during the subsequent twenty years that Handel lived it was performed only six times, and, in order to tempt the public to come and hear it, he was reduced to the expedient of getting his Italian singers to interlard it with fashionable opera songs which had nothing to do with its subject. This fact is vouched by Handel's own memoranda on the manuscript score of the oratorio, which is preserved in the Queen's library. It was not printed, moreover, while Handel lived, nor for many years after he died; the first edition having appeared in 1770; and we may add that, though there seem to have been some imperfect performances at provincial music meetings, it was not performed in London from the time of Handel's death to the Westminster Abbey Festival in 1834. On that occasion a number of airs were interpolated, taken from other works of Handel, to which new words, suited to the subject, were adapted; and the same thing (though to a smaller extent) was done by the Sacred Harmonic Society when they performed this oratorio at Exeter Hall not more than ten years ago. This practice of "cooking" a work of Handel, to make it palatable to the taste of the million, is at length abandoned. We have the oratorio as the great master left it, without addition or mutilation. It is now, in its integrity, one of the stock pieces at Exeter Hall; and no other piece attracts greater or more enthusiastic audiences.

The performance at the Crystal Palace was altogether the best that took place during the festival. If the few and unimportant airs and duets were indistinctly heard, the grandeur of the general effect, produced by the almost unbroken succession of stupendous choruses, was not greatly impaired; and the solo-singers, moreover, having become more accustomed to the locality, were better able than before to measure their voices against the expanse they had to fill, and thus avoided the mishap into which they had previously fallen, of being, sometimes, totally inaudible. We could now hear, however faintly, all the notes they sang; but it was seldom that we could catch the words they uttered. The chorus-singing was prodigiously improved; the choristers having not only got accustomed to the place, but to each other; each individual having begun to learn how to calculate the strength necessary to be given to his own voice, as a unit, in the mighty sum of which it made a part. Still, however, even the great number of voices, trained and experienced as they were, did not succeed in sufficiently filling the ear of the listener. The sounds were partially dissipated and lost in the vast space; and the music sound. d as if the assemblage, performers and audience, were all singing and listening in the open air. It is under this qualification that the following remarks on two or three of the principal pieces are to be understood.

The first chorus, "And the children of Israel sighed," one of the most pathetic of Handel's choral pieces, was beautifully sung; its long wailing notes, taken up in succession by the different parts, and then blending in one great mass of mournful harmony, being impressive in the highest degree. The air, "Their land brought forth frogs," was well sung by Miss Dolby, but she failed to give it effect. The air is trivial, and the imitation of the orchestra of the skipping frogs is one of the puerilities belonging to the taste of the day, of which even Handel could not entirely divest himself. In the next chorus, descriptive of the plague of flies and lice, there is a similar piece of ignoble mimicry represented by the instruments, and the chorus itself is not remarkable for power. It passed over, accordingly, with little notice; but the case was very different with the famous "Hailstone Chorus," a specimen of true musical description, in which the most vivid images are called up by the simplest means. We almost see the "fire mingled with hail," which "ran along the ground;" and we hear the cries and shrieks of the affrighted multitude, mingled with the howling of the storm. These effects were admirably given, and peals of applause from every corner bore testimony to the power of this wonderful musical picture. There is another picture of not less power in the chorus, "He rebuked the Red Sea," which describes the miraculous passage of the Israelites, and the destruction of the pursuing host, overwhelmed by the waters. This, too, by the help of most admirable singing, was awfully grand and imposing. The second part of the oratorio expresses the rejoicing and thanksgiving of the Israelites for this en ouious interposition of Heaven in their behalf. It consists of a magnificent series of choruses mixed with three or four airs and duets. Only two of the airs ever produce any effect. The one, "The enemy said," was sung by Mr. Sims Reeves; the other, "Thou didst blow," by Miss Dolby; and were much applauded. There is one effective duet, "The Lord is a man of war." Its plain and popular style catches the general ear, and, vigorously sung by Formes and Weiss, whose powerful voices were well heard throughout the place, it seemed to give great satisfaction to the audience. The great vocal display was Clara Novello's rendering of the celebrated solo, "Sing unto the Lord, for He hath triumphed gloriously, the horse and his rider he hath cast into the sea." The power and execution of the fair singer threw into this piece its very indescribable; her magnificent voice rang through the whole building with the clearness of a bell, and every word she uttered was distinctly heard. It was to be regretted, however, that she impaired the sublimity of the effect by the introduction of an ambitious ornament at variance with the grand simplicity of Handel's text.

Thus terminated this great and wonderful festival, which will give a fresh impulse throughout the whole nation to the study and cultivation of the music of Handel. As a musical experiment it has especially a great point, that more than two thousand voices and instruments may be brought into combination without confusion. But it has also shown that no adequate arena for the assemblage of so great a host has yet been found. The object, therefore, to find a locality sufficiently spacious for the development of the sounds of two thousand performers, and at the same time so constructed as to enable the sounds of a single performer to be completely heard. This problem, it is generally admitted, has not been solved. The transept of the Crystal Palace, it has been found, is little better for musical purposes than the middle of an open field; and it is a matter of necessity that some acoustical means be taken to give the place the compactness, vibration, and resonance which are the essential requisites of a great music-hall.

THE GRAND CALEDONIAN FANCY DRESS BALL.—This annual ball, under the immediate patronage of her Majesty and members of the Royal family, for the benefit of the Royal Caledonian Asylum and the Royal Scottish Hospital, was given at Willis's Rooms on Monday. As customary at this annual reunion, all the gentlemen attending appeared in uniform, Highland garb, or Court dress. The boys and girls clothed and educated at the institution were mustered in the lower room, headed by the juvenile band and corps of pipers. His Serene Highness the Hereditary Prince of Saxe Meiningen, and his Highness the Rajah Dhuleep Singh, were among the elite of the visitors.

POST OFFICE NOTICE.—On the 1st July next and thenceforwards the uniform stamped rate of postage will be extended to letters transmitted between the United Kingdom and the following British colonies.—Falkland Islands, Gambia, by packet or private ship. Labuan, Vancouver's Island, Jonian Islands, by private ship. Natal, by packet, vid the Cape of Good Hope, or private ship direct. For a letter above half an ounce, and not exceeding one ounce, the postage will be 1s. When above one ounce, and not exceeding two ounces, 2s., and so on, increasing 1s. for every additional ounce or fraction of an ounce. The postage of letters to the above-mentioned colonies must, in all cases, be paid in advance.

MR. CHARLES KEAN has been elected a member of the Royal Society of Antiquaries.

CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A. B.—Mr. Jaenisch has already shown, in his admirable analyses of the King's Bishop's Gambit, that Petroff's attack affords the first player the power, if not of winning, at least drawing the game.

DELTA.—The game was received too late to reasons specified, with many thanks.

J. S. I.—Your Problems are with thanks; but the one with Knight's move is the counterpart of one we have.

DR. R., Paris.—Your Problem is received. As to the copies of the paper mentioned, they are probably in the vaults of the Post-office; but now rain, they have never reached us.

B.—The ingenious variety in the game, by transposing the Bishops and Knights which was suggested by a correspondent a few weeks ago, is deserving more attention than it appears to have received in this country. The Americans, who show more activity in testing the merits of positions than we do, have already been trying the new variation in their principal clubs, and it is said to be much approved.

A SUBSCRIBER.—You will no doubt be a loser by not buying any or all of the works on the game enumerated of C. Skeet, publisher, King William-street, Charing-cross, who keeps the largest assortment of Chess books of any bookseller in London. 2. The best blank Chess diagrams and the cheapest are those printed by Messrs. Ashbee and Jaggard, of Bedford-street, Covent-garden.

DAMIA.—We are in daily expectation of receiving a budget of games contested by the chief of the Russian players, Messrs Petroff, Jaenisch, Schumoff, and the two Princes Dolgorouki and Sergius Ourousoff, but of our old friends of India, Mr. Cochrane and the Messrs. Boscawen, we have had no tidings for many months.

G. T. M.—The "Terrapin" Chess board is a clever contrivance, as having a neat box or frame round it, which shuts up, and so forms a most elegant pattern of a Chess-board over-mast. Some of these boards are made to slide in grooves of wood, with massive carved oak frames; some of enamelled glass, with an elevated border of rosewood. One of these boards and a set of Jaques's Staunton Chessmen (large size), in ivory form the most splendid accompaniment that a Chess-player can possibly desire.

D. L. Foote.—If Bertin has long played the Muzio Gambit, he is a rare player of Chess, we believe. In the latter department of the game he was, perhaps unequalled, certainly never surpassed. His last compositions—masterpieces of strategy, which he dedicated to my humble self—were published in this Journal a few years since.

M. A., Cambridge.—The author of the work mentioned, "The History of Civilisation in England," is the Mr. Buckle so long distinguished as one of the finest Chess-players England has ever produced.

LES OFFICIERS DE L'ARCOLE.—A list of the successful solvers shall be appended to our Chess notices next week.

LILE DELL.—Next, but rather too easy.

C. LOWESTHORPE.—It shall find a place in our Belgrun corner.

J. B. of Bridport.—The Problem is not so evident in the last diagram rece-ved as usual.

L. P.—All too simple, or too ill-constructed, for publication.

 Communications which require consideration shall be replied to next week.

FASHIONS FOR JULY.

THE Handel Festival at the Crystal Palace—the recent floral fêtes at the Chiswick and Regent-park Gardens, together with other gay amusements, al fresco—have drawn together numerous assemblages of fashionable company, and given occasion for an unusual amount display of out-door costume. At the flower shows, indeed, the best of the ladies have rivalled with many almost say outvied—the most brilliant hues of the parterre.

The warm weather has called forth robes of barège, muslin, and other transparent textures; but dresses of rich silk nevertheless maintain their pre-eminence. At some of the fashionable morning fêtes many ladies have worn dresses of pink or blue moiré antique, others have worn glacé of light gay hues, shaded with white, the flounces being figured in various fanciful designs and in every variegated colour admits of being brought into juxtaposition. Even at morning fêtes some ladies have appeared in dresses of white tulle.

Among the most admired bonnets we may mention those of French chip, or of crape, or tulle, puffed, bouilloné, or soufflé. Bonnets of very fine leghorn have also been worn. Shawls of black or white lace, and mantelets of silk of various forms, have been very numerous. We have observed several basquines made up of coloured silk, the silk serving merely as a lining for the innumerable rows of lace with which these basquines were covered. Here and there has been seen a costly shawl of China crape, richly embroidered. Mantelets of white worked muslin have been very numerous, some lined with coloured silk, others without any lining.

We will here briefly describe a few of the most elegant out-door costumes worn at the Crystal Palace and other places of fashionable resort.

One consisted of a robe of organdie, figured in a Mosaic design in bright hues on a white ground. The skirt had five flounces edged with satin stripes in brilliant shades of pink. The corsage had a trimming forming bretelles descending in a point at the waist in front and at the back. The mantelet was of white Maltese lace. The bonnet was a mixture of white tulle and very fine fancy straw. With it was worn a demi-veil of white tulle, rounded at the corners, and edged with a very narrow ruche. The bonnet was trimmed, both on the outside and under the brim, with white and red rose.

Another greatly-admired dress was of mallow-coloured silk. Mallow is a hue at present highly fashionable. The dress had a double skirt, the upper one embroidered at the edge and up each side with silk of the same colour as the dress. The corsage and sleeves were embroidered to correspond. With this dress was worn a half-shawl of rich black lace. The bonnet was of French chip, with white marabout feathers, tipped with mallow. A white parasol, with very broad fringe, completed this costume.

The dresses worn by two young ladies (sisters) were extremely becoming, and greatly admired. Both wore basquines of black tulle, almost entirely covered with narrow black velvet ribbon disposed in various ways: as straight rows, lozenges, zig-zags, &c. The basque was edged with a row of very broad black lace, set on rather full. One of the young ladies wore a dress of that bright fresh hue called Celadon green, with side trimmings formed of ruches disposed in the lozenge form, and graduating in size from the bottom upward. The dress of the other lady was of glacé silk, of a beautiful tint of pearl grey. It had three flounces edged with white and figured satin. These ladies were bonnets of sewed white chip, tastefully trimmed with white ribbon blonde and flowers.

Double skirts are more worn than ever; though certainly not to the exclusion of flounces or skirts with side trimmings. For silk dresses all these styles are fashionable. Silk in small chequered patterns is much worn for morning robes, and are also for plain walking dresses. These chequered silks may be had in various colours; brown, green, or lilac seem, however, to be most general. A dress of this sort of chequered silk, when intended for plain walking costume may have side trimmings on the skirt made of the silk itself, combined with velvet. The corsage should be high, and with a basque trimmed in the same style as the skirt. Dresses of poplin are usually made with double skirts, and trimmed with velvet. The upper skirt may be open at each side, the openings being confined at intervals by ornaments of velvet or bows and ends of velvet ribbon. A very tasteful dress has just been made of silver-grey poplin, and trimmings of maroon velvet. It has a double skirt, each being edged with a triple row of maroon velvet. The effect is at once novel and elegant.

Many ball dresses are made with bouilloné flounces placed closely one above another, fastened at intervals by ribbon. The bouilloné flounces are frequently covered with other flounces of white or black lace. The latter is highly fashionable; but it is employed for evening dresses only. Dresses of white crape should have flounces of white lace; but may be trimmed with coloured ribbon. The corsages are made short, and are covered with bouillonés, or with [illegible] of lace. The corsages may be draped, and trimmed at the top with a deep fall of lace. Sometimes the corsage is made quite plain, and over it is worn a small fichu of white tulle, shaped to the top of the corsage at the back, and then crossed in front. The long ends, flowing loosely over the skirt, should be trimmed in accordance with the style adopted for the dress.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

Fig. 1. Barège dress with double skirt. The upper skirt is in the tunic style, and is trimmed at each side with ruches of ribbon. The corsage is trimmed in corresponding style, and round the waist is a ceinture tied at one side. The sleeves are in the style of those seen in the portraits of Marguerite de Valois; that is to say, the puffs are separated one from the other by bands. Collar of worked muslin. Bonnet of white tulle, trimmed with flowers and blonde guipure. Mantelet of black silk, trimmed with lace.

Fig. 2. Robe of mallow-coloured glacé, with side trimmings representing large leaves formed of ruches of mallow-coloured ribbon, edged with narrow black lace. The corsage, which has a basque, is tastefully closed up the front with bows of ribbon. The sleeves have three falls falling one over the other. The collar is of a new shape, called the Rustori, being copied from one worn by the celebrated actress of that name. It is made of rows of lace insertion. Under-sleeves of the same. The head-dress is formed of two short barbes of [illegible] lace and ends of satin.

Fig. 3. Dress of silver-grey glacé, having the skirt ornamented with side trimmings of pink glacé. The corsage has a [illegible] with three frills of pink silk. Sleeves formed of two [illegible] and two frills, edged with pink. Collar and under sleeves of Irish point, and the collar fixed in front of the neck by a bow of pink ribbon. Head-dress of pink and white flowers.

THE FRENCH IMPERIAL GUARD.—The following are the prominent points of a letter from the Emperor to Marshal Vaillant, relative to admission into and promotion in the Imperial Guard:—"Marshal, After the conferences which I have held with you and with the other marshals, you have adopted the following decree concerning the organisation of the Imperial Guard. The guard ought to be considered as a powerful reserve on the field of battle, and as a choice corps, offering to the army a new means of reward for all who have distinguished themselves by services or brilliant deeds. . . . The Guard should be to the troops of the line what, in the infantry, are the select companies to the ordinary ones—namely, an object of emulation and not of jealousy. In our state of military subordination, the upper grades inspire no jealousy, because they are open to all, and because promotion is only to be obtained by obeying fixed rules. It is the same for the select companies, which are generally commanded by the most experienced and most meritorious officers. They are likewise in major portion formed of the best and oldest non-commissioned officers and soldiers. The same rules must apply to the recruitment of the Guard. Admission into this corps d'elite must be submitted to fixed rules always open to the whole army. . . . Besides, for brilliant actions, it will be necessary, in order to gain admission into the Guard—for soldiers, good conduct during at least two years' service; for non-commissioned officers, one year's rank; for officers, from lieutenants to generals of division, two years' rank; for sub-lieutenants, only one year's rank, since, were a long service exacted, many sub-lieutenants on entering the Guard would lose their chances of promotion. * * * All vacancies in the Guard will be filled up by officers from the Line. As for the non-commissioned officers, they will be admitted in a given proportion. The Guard will enjoy certain advantages; but will possess no privilege otherwise than that of guarding their Sovereign. It will be submitted to the same regulations as the Line, and should always offer an example of devotedness, discipline, and instruction. * * * The observance of these rules will result in the advantage of exciting in the army a noble emulation without injuring individual rights, of consecrating the memory of the fields of battle where the Guard has recruited its most glorious soldiers, and of endowing the country and the army with a new element of strength and power. Whereupon I pray God to have you in his holy keeping. "NAPOLEON."

THE TURNER COLLECTION AT MARLBOROUGH HOUSE.

We announced last week the Exhibition of the remaining oil pictures bequeathed by Turner to the nation, numbering some two-thirds more than those placed last winter in Marlborough House. At the same time we made a few observations respecting the broad features of Turner's mind and practice, to which we refer our readers, having no space to enter again upon extensive generalities with so much collateral interest. We shall now attempt an examination of the new pictures in detail, commencing with those painted before the year 1820, for three reasons. First, because Turner went to Rome in 1819; secondly, because he began to cease imitating other painters about this date; and, thirdly, because colour afterwards became far more conspicuous. Turner never repeated himself, and his wonderful variousness may be seen even in the titles of the following pictures. In that, during this period, he imitated so many preceding and even contemporary painters, he only followed the advice of Sir Joshua Reynolds in his Discourses, but that he did so during more than twenty years, with his impatient temperament and daring imagination, is only one of many enigmas connected with his name.

The works bearing the earliest dates (1798) are Nos. 460 and 461. They were painted when Turner was twenty-four years old, and indicate much which was characteristic of him throughout his career. The first, "Buttermere Lake, with part of Cromack Water, Cumberland A Shower," is too black; but its aerial effects, the various depths of mountain mist and rain-cloud, are truthful, and the rainbow, though the whole picture is negative in hue, may be taken as suggesting a natural love of colour. The second, "Morning on the Coniston Fells, Cumberland," has the same qualities; with its rolling mist retiring before the morning sun, and the patch of light falling on the acclivity which brings out the solidly-painted moss-grown rocks, the rugged bed of the stream, and the flocks seeking their rough pasturage.

The next picture in the catalogue, "Landscape, with Cattle in Water" (462), although bearing no date, would prove him in his rich glow and perfect realisation of some of the most favourite effects of the Dutch painters a very considerable interval, if Turner were to be judged as other painters. But the bringing together all objects upon a given plane by atmospheric gradation, and the toning of a picture, which are the last qualities obtained by artists in general, we find Turner actually set out with. The cattle in this picture are really well drawn, and note the admirable liquidity of the still water, and the nicely-observed reflections from it under the animals.

"Æneas with the Sibyl, Lake Avernus" (463), is a marvellously close imitation of Wilson, though with scarcely so much air as that painter would have given. The lines from the "Æneid" which accompany the title describe two separate and successive incidents, which Turner has, with the license of the old painters, represented going forward simultaneously in the picture. The classical allusions are further explained in the catalogue.

"Rizpah Watching the Bodies of her Sons" (464) illustrates, with several other works, the morbid tendency in Turner's mind to the terrible, and even the grotesque a tendency the more singular from its coexistence with the most intense love of the beautiful. The picture can scarcely be seen at all in its present position; but, as it is the first to display a remarkable peculiarity in the artist's mind, and as we have taken more trouble to ascertain its contents than our readers will probably afford, they may thank us for a description The subject is taken from the second book of Samuel, where it is related that the Israelites were visited with famine three years, through the murderous persecution by Saul of the Gibeonites, with whom the Jews had sworn peace and amity. To satisfy the justice of the Almighty, David was obliged to give up seven of the sons of Saul to the vengeance of the Gibeonites—the two sons of Rizpah being of the number. The wretched mother would not allow their bodies to be buried, "but took sackcloth and spread it for her upon a rock from the beginning of harvest, until water dropped upon them out of heaven, and suffered neither the birds of the air to rest on them by day, nor the beasts of the field by night" (xxi 10). She thus broke one of the laws of the Jews, which strictly enjoined that he which is hanged, being "accursed of God," should be buried on the day of execution, that "his body might not defile the land." Mr. Ruskin, in speaking incidentally of this picture, justly remarks that it connects the English landscape-painter with the German interpreters of fantastic or pathetic superstition. Rizpah is sitting, with an old weird attendant, in a murky night—a black indistinguishable mass lying by her side, which must be the bodies of her sons, for the sackcloth is gory beneath them. The rest of the picture is not left for representation, but may be supposed to be the ghastly apparitions and fantastic shapes evoked by the terror-stricken imagination of Rizpah. She buries her face in her hand, to shut out, on the one side, several spectral forms, revealed by an ignis fatuus gleam, who are about to slaughter an infant, while the figure stands by in statue-like fateful rigidity. On the other side, and before the miserable woman, a goblin sports with a scorpion and a monstrous dragon-fly; toads gape, snakes glide and writhe, and from under the slimy growth of weeds fringing the margin of the inky pool, which seems to be sleeping like a type of death, a serpent has fixed upon and holds fast in its fangs another unimaginable winged creature.

The little picture, "A Mountain Scene" (465), is noteworthy among the early pictures for its freshness of colour, with its pure and tender blue sky, and the charming contrast of the white clouds against the warm colour of the tower catching the morning light.

"The Tenth Plague of Egypt" (470) is the first work of surpassing grandeur; and we doubt if, in completeness and impressive massive sublimity, it is surpassed by any picture in the collection. It is a palpable imitation of both Nicholas and Gaspar Poussin, including the anachronism of the machiolated architecture and the characters on the obelisk or slanting side of a building on the left; whilst foliage is swayed and boughs snapped with the savage fury of Salvator Rosa. The whole scene but more particularly the finely-composed lines and terraces of buildings on the right—is illuminated by a vivid flash of storm-lightning, which darts and pulsates from the heaving, rolling, portentous masses of thunder-cloud, which obscure the sky. The Angel of the Lord has already done his work, and the first-born of Egypt have been smitten in the death-stillness of midnight. But the Egyptians have taken the alarm, and rush frantically about in the distance with their glaring torches in vain to find the invisible destroyer. In the foreground mothers are seen mourning over their stricken offspring; and one in particular—a noble figure, sitting in a fine classical attitude—has resigned herself to absolute despair.

"The Holy Family" (473) was probably painted in rivalry with Reynolds; but the powerful effect of the background and the Titianesque depth of tone are even more "old masterish" than Sir Joshua. The face of the Virgin is not altogether uninteresting, and the attitude of the Child is well conceived; but the vulgar type of Joseph's overgrown head, the want of expression, the absence of drawing, either of form or proportion, and the ridiculous failure of almost every attempt at foreshortening—as, for instance, in the inflated sack which stands for Joseph's body—being all found in a work in which Turner must have striven to do his best, we are little surprised at his subsequent frequent inability to introduce figures with success. Allowance must be made for his want of practice at the early period when this picture was painted (1803); but its excellence in other respects argues a want of perception of the refinements of human form, which is borne out by most of Turner's later works. Precisely the same remarks apply to the interesting portrait of Turner by himself (468), which was, however, painted before the last pictures. Many passages of its flesh-tints are fine, the handling is firm, and the general effect deep and solid; but the drawing is extremely feeble, and it conveys no impression of nature or vitality.

"The Destruction of Sodom—Lot and his Family leaving the City" (473) has the characteristics of the "Tenth Plague of Egypt," except that here we are in the midst of the deafening roar and crash of actual ruin, while there we only felt the chill, brooding horror of silent destruction. Here the lightning—blue against the fire—no longer merely illuminates, but cleaves the solid masonry, and hurls over the toppling tower. Of illumination we get indeed more than enough from the great central vortex of white whirling flame, and its yellow and crimson reflection. The air is too hot for smoke; but thin, sulphureous vapour partly veils the ghastly scene where the figures are convulsed in the last agony, and the trains of lambent flame lap up the runlets of blood, or the dead are pounded into dust by the falling rocks. From the darkest part of all this terror and confusion Lot and his family, except the spectral heap behind, are seen emerging as if enveloped in an atmosphere of pale, innocent light.

"The Blacksmith's Shop" (478) is said to have been painted in consequence of the great praise awarded to Wilkie's "Village Politicians" the year before. The general effect, we need not say, is excellent; and the relative distance of the three compartments of the shop is graduated with an aerial truth for which Wilkie would have substituted glazed and bituminous depth. But beyond this the picture contains much excellent painting of detail, and its precision of touch Turner has not equalled in any other work. The poultry, the vice, the pots, pans, and kettles on the left, and the old brick wall with the plaster peeled off, are really capital. The pony is rather a queer animal, but the man stoops well to shoe him; and the two gossips are admirably idle and listless in their disputation. "Harvest Home" (502), an elaborately-planned but unfinished picture, also shows, in the Scotchman taking snuff, the woman's cap, &c., a palpable intention of rivalling Wilkie.

"The Death of Nelson" (480) is a terrific realisation of that most awful form of human strife a sea fight, and a magnificent commemoration of, to our mind, the most touching and heroic incident in modern warfare. The spectator is placed on the mizen starboard shrouds of the Victory, and thus obtains, as well as may be through the smoke, a half "bird's-eye" view of the whole slippery bloody deck, with the sailors struggling at the gun carriages, the group surrounding the wounded Nelson, and some brawny fellows hauling on board the flag of the enemy's ship, which has struck on the larboard. one of whom is calling the dying hero's attention to their prize. Over the sides of the ship, from which the guns under our feet flash in fierce unanimity, the Redoubtable is seen, from "the tops" of which that shot was fired which pierced a nation's heart. Beyond these foremost ships, through wreaths of smoke and piles of battle fog, the hulls of the great ships loom with their apparent elevation and gigantic bulk, greatly increased from the peculiar point of view chosen. Overhead the splintered masts, the torn and flapping sails, and the cloven cordage, form a mass of inextricable confusion, which completes an effect of terror—of life or death pertinacity—of thunderous uproar and din and of horrible carnage, such as we never before saw realised on canvas, and which entitles this picture to rank as the grandest representation of such a scene.

DIFFERENCES.

I.

The King can drink the best of wine—
So can I;
And has enough when he would dine—
So have I;
And cannot order Rain or Shine—
Nor can I.
Then where's the difference—let me see—
Betwixt my Lord the King and me?

II.

Do trusty friends surround his throne
Night and day?
Or make his interest their own?
No, not they.
Mine love me for myself alone—
Bless'd be they!
And that's one difference which I see
Betwixt my lord the King and me.

III.

Do knaves around me lie in wait
To deceive,
Or fawn and flatter when they hate,
And would grieve?
Or cruel pomps oppress my state,—
By my leave?
No! Heaven be thanked! And here you see
More difference 'twixt the King and me!

IV.

He has his fools, with jests and quips,
When he'd play;
He has his armies and his ships—
Great are they;
But not a child to kiss his lips,
Well-a-day!
And that's a difference sad to see
Betwixt my lord the King and me.

V.

I wear the cap and he the crown—
What of that?
I sleep on straw and he on down—
What of that?
And he's the King and I'm the clown—
What of that?
If happy I, and wretched he,
Perhaps the King would change with me!

CHARLES MACKAY.

THE TOLL NUISANCE.—At the last weekly meeting of the Representative Council of St. Pancras, on a proposition being brought forward by Mr. G. A. Young, as chairman of the committee of works, to raise £80,000 as a first instalment of the sum of £160,000 for paying off the Hampstead-road, New-road, and Grey's-inn road which the power lately granted to a vote for £200,000 the following amendment was carried on the motion of Mr. Brettingham:—"That looking at the present high rate of interest, and the probability of having the turnpike roads thrown upon the parish, it is not expedient to borrow more than £8000 for the repaving of the New-road with granite." An important point was mentioned by Mr. Young in the course of his speech, viz.,—"there could be no doubt that the present evasion of the public toll tended greatly to the injury of that parish, as it not only cut up the parochial roads, but was a source of great inconvenience and nuisance to the inhabitants of residential streets. He hoped the day was not far distant when the tolls would be abolished."

HIGHWAYS AND TURNPIKES.—Mr. Massey's new bill has just been printed. It gives power to the intended new highway boards to select and resolve that turnpike roads out of debt shall be converted into highways; and, on the Secretary of State approving, all turnpike gates and bars in such selected districts are to be abolished; but, by clause 4, the metropolis and all the parishes in the area of the Metropolitan Board of Works are specially excepted from the Act. Government has already removed the toll-gates in Dublin, has a bill in Parliament to clear all Ireland from them, and now, when the English measure is produced, the metropolis is excepted. Is London to be the only spot with these obstructions?

A colossal block has been placed in the studio of Mr. John Steell, for the statue of Allan Ramsay, the poet, about to be erected on the terrace of Ramsay-gardens. The block is from Binny-quarry, and is considered a very fine specimen. Its weight is about sixteen tons.

CRYSTAL PALACE PICTURE GALLERY.

IT is probable that, had the Crystal Palace been, from the first, a highly remunerative speculation, we should not have seen its management with untiring energy catering for the instruction and amusement of visitors by every branch of nature and art that can be conveniently displayed in this building. The dividends of the capitalists have not answered their expectations. But we must say the public would be indeed insatiable if it was not sensible of the extraordinary exertions that have been made to provide fare of a solid description, which goes far to make up for the cardinal error, ab initio, of making any place of exhibition so far out of town, and involving the consumption of so much time going and coming. When at length we do get there, it must be admitted that the entertainments are not at all of a claptrap description; and, from the monster Handel Festival to the gigantic pine of California, we find ourselves amidst efforts to present real superiority.

The Picture Gallery, being an after-thought, and having to deal with special rivals, made last year a rather unpromising debût. It is, however, only justice to Mr. Mogford, the director, to say that this is a growing institution, and that in time we look forward to its being a most attractive portion of the Palace, inasmuch as it introduces us to a greater variety of schools than we find elsewhere. We proceed to notice what appear to us to be the best of the new pictures of the season.

A landscape by Zimmermann, of Munich, representing a dark-wooded and rocky dell, the vast trunks of trees showing firm handling, and the water and aquatic vegetation to correspond. The feeling of the sombre loneliness of the depths of a forest, where primeval trees have for centuries known nothing of the woodman's axe, is given with the most signal ability. But there appears to us to be an inconsistency between the size of the stag and the trees: either the stag is much too small, or the trees are, to take the stag as a metre, much too gigantic for Europe in general, and reminding us of the growths of America.

Of an opposite description, and to us a preferable picture, is Gartlit's "Coast of Naples," representing an open expanse of coast, evidently in winter, but with admirable sunlight, moderately warming every part of the picture: it is not the fierce heat and intense azure of summer, but a fine winter sunset, on the Campanian coast: the high-walled villa garden, the cypress, the sea, the red gold mountain slopes, recall the land of citron bloom with great effect. As a vivid reminiscence of the most picturesque part of Italy this picture appears to us to be unexceptionable. The outline is firm, as it ought to be, and the subject comprises with felicity the chief characteristics of this description of scenery.

"The Intercepted Letter," by Baron Jolly, a Belgian General. This picture represents a château of the seventeenth century, in which a young lady is caught in correspondence. It is weak in expression, but the still life is every bit as good as that of Netscher, and other men who imitated satins and velvets, marble and wood, with such perfection. But why not give us actual modern Belgian life? Netscher painted the life and manners of his own day, not those of Charles the Bold. The historical painter may go back, but genre ought to be the glass of fashion the mirror of actual life: it thus becomes historical to posterity

There are other pictures of Netherlands painters that please us extremely—Pieron's view of a white house in the environs of Antwerp, and Roelof's "Spring." The former has a touch and a glaze of verdant earth and clod that reminds us of Wynants and there is an unassuming strength of tone that shows the landscape-painter of genuine power. The finish is everywhere earnest, but quite subordinate to breadth of effect. The other picture, Roelof's "Spring," is a perfect little piece of local nature, with just that sparkling relief of general green which the wild flowers give at the opening of the year.

We go hastily over some other pictures, foremost among which is a very good portrait of the Empress of the French, by Rouget, in the most silvery tone.

Landscapes with Moslem figures are now more common than they were some years ago. We have M. Fladin's view of the great Mosque of Ispahan. This gentleman, along with M. Pascal Coste, accompanied the mission of M. de Sercey, seven years ago, to Persia, and the result was a rich addition to our archæological illustrations of that country. The subject of this picture is one of the most striking to be met with in the East. Another picture, a view in Algeria, by Grolig, of Versailles, gives us the winter fog and stunted vegetation of a part of this French possession, treated in the modern German landscape manner. Couturier's fowls show great study of the nature and aspects of poultry; and a "Cattle Piece," by Troyon, illustrative of bovine affections, has that truth of observation and breadth without coarseness of handling which he is known to possess. A replica of Biard's most amusing "Custom-house Examination of Baggage" has renewed our acquaintance with a well-known and popular picture. Leys, in "A Woman Pleading," shows fine chiaroscuro, but a farcical outline that spoils all.

FINE ARTS.

GALVANO-PHOTOGRAPHY. PHOTOGRAPHIC ART-TREASURES.
Part IV.

WE have already noticed this ingenious and beautiful invention of Herr Pretsch, director of the Imperial Printing Press of Vienna, by which galvanism engraves on plates the pictures obtained by sunlight, or, in the agents of this company say, by which "nature and art are illustrated by art and nature." The publications of the Patent Photo-galvano-graphic Company come so fully up to whatever expectations were formed of this process that we anticipate for Herr Pretsch a place in the future history of the development of this departure in science scarcely, if at all, inferior to that of Mr. Daguerre. It is only necessary to look at this publication and be convinced that the ordinary draughtsman and lithographic engraver can no more ultimately stand his ground against this invention than the handloom weaver could resist the combination of the steam-engine of Watt and the spinning-jenny of Arkwright. Here is a delicacy, a verisimilitude, and a minuteness which must be the despair of hundreds of deserving artists who have, by long years of painful effort, attained a point which might be denominated "labour in vain." Take, for instance, the view in this number of "Richmond-on-Thames," photographed by R. F. Barnes. The time is winter, the leaves are off the trees, and the snow is on the roofs. Yet, wholly unaided by colour, we feel such a perfect concordance of the gradations and sharp contrasts of tint that we are at once impressed with an exhilarating feeling of a select type of truth. We are persuaded that the effect would be greatly heightened by a broad border of absolute jet black. The gist of the effect is in the highest lights to which the broad white rim is too powerful a rival. In "A Brace of Birds," photographed by Mr. Lake Price, where the ground is black the converse holds good; there the white border brings out the obscure. As for the details of the feathers, they are so perfect that memory is compelled at once to suggest the colour of each part, and complete the picture to the mind's eye. Higher praise we cannot give. The variety of subjects is one of the charms of this publication. How different from the birds, with their black ground, is the finely luminous horizon of Sidney Cooper's "Cattle"! How it trembles on that lazy river!

This invention is a terrible blow to the ordinary draughtsman and engraver; but, as Campanella says, "Society is built of ruins; the ruins are men, but the edifice is humanity."

THE ORPHAN WORKING SCHOOL, HAVERSTOCK-HILL.—The committee of this charity announce in their ninety-ninth annual report the proposed celebration of its centenary. The committee have recommended, and the governors of the charity have agreed, that the most suitable mode of commemorating the centenary will be so to enlarge the present building, which is admirably adapted for the purpose, as to provide accommodation for 400 orphan children instead of 240, for which it was originally intended. To do this, and to provide for their maintenance, clothing, and education, a sum of at least £25,000 will be required. During the last ten years 310 children have been admitted to the benefits of the charity, but the candidates are at least four times as many as those that succeed. Already several donations varying from one guinea to 100 guineas have been received, and a considerable amount is promised.

SKETCHES IN BORNEO.

BRUNI.

In the year 1521 Magellan first saw Borneo. No other European had previously seen it. Three hundred years, or rather more, elapsed before any innovation was made. The English were then necessitated to interfere in certain differences at Sarawak, and to demand of the Sultan of Bruni that respect should be shown to the British flag. Some years since this town was visited by Rajah Brooke. On his arrival he found it a "Venice of hovels," as it has been called. It is the capital of Borneo Proper, situated up a river, ten miles from the sea. Most of the houses are built on piles, the remainder being erected on the ground. At the back of these tenements the hills gradually rise, with the nipas and other trees growing on them, as delineated in the Engraving. At a distance the locality is miserable to behold; but on a near approach the lively and busy aspect which usually pervades the town produces a very different impression. There being no shops in Bruni, bargaining in many sorts of articles is pursued in the little craft which lie off the town. Several Chinese junks navigate the river. Indeed, there is more commercial intercourse with China than with Europe. There are two streets in the town, intersecting each other, forming an irregular cross, and dividing it into four sections. The palace is large, but as incommodious as the houses. Iron is so scarce as to be sufficiently valuable to be used as money. The lower orders of people wear a conical straw hat, with a very wide brim; and others are but slenderly clothed. The population (whose number is uncertain) chiefly consist of Malays, who indicate their citizenship by calling themselves Brunese. The Dyaks nearer the centre of the island are more barbarous than those residing on the coast, upon whom civilisation has produced its ameliorating effects. Borneo exports gold, diamonds, and antimony—the last being the most valuable. The Rajahs who preceded Sir James Brooke, perceiving the wealth which this metal would produce, compelled the Dyaks to become their slaves in working the mines. This cruel policy led first to a dispute, and then to an insurrection. Rajah Brooke interceded and defended their cause. The cession of Sarawak was the result of the struggle. It is only recently that news has arrived thence of another affray of a serious character, in which the Rajah almost sacrificed his life, and suffered the loss of valuable property. It is to be hoped that our new Plenipotentiary to China will be enabled to allay existing differences, and place the principles of our intercourse with the Chinese upon an amicable basis.

RAPANG, VILLAGE OF THE STUNG TRIBE OF DYAKS.

This picturesque village is situated in the province belonging to Rajah Brooke. It consists of one immense hut and a smaller one. These huts are built of bamboo, and have roofs formed of the nepar-palm. The whole structure is built on stout bamboo posts, which elevate the buildings above the thick jungle. In front is a terrace. The dwellings, which all communicate with each other, are longitudinally divided by a partition. One half of the dwellings nearest the terrace are used as a place of reception and accommodation for visitors. The other half of the buildings form the living place of the inmates.

DANISH COSTUMES.

HOLIDAY DRESS, LASO.

EVERY-DAY DRESS, LASO.

We have been favoured by a Correspondent at Copenhagen with the accompanying characteristic Illustrations of Danish life, from coloured drawings by M. F. C. Lund, of Laso. The first and second figures wear peasants' dresses from Laso, an island situated in the Kattegat. First is a Sunday dress, consisting of a cambric handkerchief as head-gear; a black velvet bodice, under which is a small waistcoat laced with a silver chain; the four large buttons on the bodice are also of silver, sometimes the two upper ones are even of gold. The skirt and apron are of rich brocaded silk, the skirt generally of light blue, and the apron lilac, yellow, or white.

The second figure wears a week-day dress. The head-dress is larger, of home-made linen, with fringe. The bodice is of blue cloth, the skirt of a green woollen stuff, made by the peasants themselves; and the apron is of gingham.

The island of Kattegat is quite flat. As peculiarities may be named every house has its own small windmill and high flag-stand, employed for signals. The houses are thatched with seaweed, from four to five feet thick; the top of the roof is flat, and used as a look-out. The inhabitants live from fishing and shipwrecks: the cultivation of land is not regarded, and principally attended to by the females.

The third figure wears a Sunday dress from Fanø, a small island in the Lim-Fjord. The dress consists of home-made coarse cloth; the hair is worn long, but formerly the custom was to wear it much longer.

The island is known in the old history of Denmark, and many fabulous tales about elves and fairies are connected with it, and still believed in by the poorer classes. On the island is found an immense stone, with a hollow like an entrance, whence the elves and fairies are said to come forth in the night.

Fourthly is a bride from Fano, an island situated on the south-west coast of Jutland. Her dress is of black cloth, trimmed with

...d, the apron is of white calico; the head-dress of artificial ... gold and silver ribbons. On the wedding-day the bride wears nine skirts, otherwise only seven; it is remarkable that the females only on their wedding day show their hair, it is considered a shame for a woman to show her hair to a man before or after that day, wherefore they always wear a tightly-bound handkerchief over their head, and even sleep with it. The island is flat, towards the German Ocean are the renowned sandhills (sandkliter). The men are good sailors and get their living on the sea; the cultivation of the land is ...rved on by the women.

THE EDUCATIONAL CONFERENCE.

On Monday afternoon the first of the three general Conferences to behold with a view of fully discussing the Educational question in all its bearings, especially in relation to the early age at which the children of the working classes are removed from school, was held at Willis's Rooms, under the presidency of His Royal Highness Prince Albert and a number of distinguished noblemen and gentlemen. Long before the hour fixed for the Prince to take the chair the room was completely crowded, and the reception accorded to his Royal Highness on his arrival was most warm and flattering. Seated near his Royal Highness, on either side, were Earl Granville, the Bishop of Oxford, the Bishop of St. Asaph, Bishop of London Bishop of Durham, Bishop of Sodor and Man, Bishop of Winchester, Bishop of Manchester, Lord Brougham, Lord Ward, Lord Calthorpe, Sir John Pakington, Lord Kinnaird, Mr. Robert Owen, Rev. Canon Moseley, Major-General Grey, Miss Carpenter, Rev. W. Rogers, &c.

His Royal Highness, who on his rising was received with prolonged cheering, immediately proceeded to address the meeting as follows:—

Gentlemen, we have met to-day in the sacred cause of education—of national education. This word, which means no less than the moral and intellectual development of the rising generation, and, therefore, the national welfare, is well calculated to engross our minds, and opens a question worthy of a nation's deepest interest and most anxious consideration. Gentlemen, the nation is alive to its importance, and our presence here to-day gives further evidence (if such evidence were needed, of its anxiety to give it that consideration (Hear, hear). Looking to former times, we find that our forefathers, with their wonted piety and parental care, had established a system of national education, based upon the parish organisation and forming part of parish life, which met the wants of their day, and had in it a certain unity and completeness which we may well envy at the present moment. But in the progress of time our wants have outstripped this system, and the condition of the country has so completely changed, even within these last fifty years, that the old parochial division is no longer adequate for the present population. This has increased during that period in England and Wales from, in round numbers, 9,000,000 to 18,000,000, and, where there formerly existed comparatively small towns and villages, we now see mighty cities like Liverpool, Manchester, Hull, Leeds, Birmingham, and others, with their hundreds of thousands, springing up almost, as it were, by enchantment. London having increased to nearly two-and-a-half million of souls, and the factory district of Lancashire alone having aggregated a population of nearly 3,000,000, within a radius of twenty miles! This change could not escape the watchful eye of a patriotic public; but how to provide the means of satisfying the new wants could not be a matter of easy solution. While zeal for the public good, a fervent piety, and true philanthropy are unanimously and eminently distinguishing our countrymen, the love of liberty and an aversion from being controlled by the power of the State in matters nearest to their hearts, are characteristics which will always powerfully influence them in action. Thus the common object has been contemplated from the most different points of view, and pursued often upon antagonistic principles. Some have sought the aid of Government, others that of the church to which they belong; some have declared it to be the duty of the State to provide elementary instruction for the people at large, others have seen in State interference a check to the spontaneous exertions of the people themselves, and an interference with self-government; some again have advocated a plan of compulsory education based upon local self-government, and others the voluntary system in its widest development. While these have been some of the political subjects of difference, those in the religious field have not been less marked and potent. Some have sought the aid of Government, where

That throughout the north of Europe the children of the working classes are kept for a longer period at school, and to a riper age, than in this country

In speaking to this resolution the right hon. gentleman pointed out some of the facilities which prevailed in foreign countries for passing and carrying into effect educational measures, and the difficulties which presented themselves in this country on account of the differences of opinion which prevailed amongst the people.

Mr. Ackroyd in seconding the resolution, was bound, as a great employer, to say that the progress of education in the manufacturing districts had been arrested, not by parents but by employers, who had thrown all sorts of impediments in the way.

The noble Chairman put the resolution to the meeting, and it was adopted.

Sir J. K. Shuttleworth, Bart., read the report from Section C, and then moved the following resolution.

That registration, certificate, and prize schemes have been shown to be applied in certain localities with advantage and to be worthy of more extensive trial.

Mr. E Baines, of Leeds, seconded the resolution, and expressed his entire sympathy with the objects of the Conference. He was glad to find so general an expression of opinion that the great evil to be remedied was the early age at which children were removed from school. Towards the redress of that evil he should be happy, with others, to direct his best attention.

Mr. Robert Owen asked Mr. Baines whether he remembered a report made by him late father on the state of the schools at New Lanark, which were some years ago under his direction?

Mr Baines said he not only remembered the circumstance, but in consequence of that report he was induced himself to visit the schools, and a more delightful spectacle he never saw in his life.

The Rev Canon Girdlestone spoke in support of the resolution, which was unanimously adopted.

The Dean of Salisbury presented the report from Section D, and proposed the following resolution :

That the voluntary halfpenny schemes have been with success adopted in certain localities, and may be recommended for further trial.

Mr. Samuel Morley seconded the resolution, which was carried unanimously.

The Dean of Bristol brought up the report from Section E ; and the Hon. and Rev. Grantham Yorke, of Birmingham, moved the following resolution :—

That this Conference considers the encouragement of industrial education in elementary schools, especially amongst girls, to be very desirable, and that such instruction is peculiarly important in the reformation of juvenile offenders

Mr J. Symons seconded the resolution, which was carried.

The Bishop of Bodor and Man proposed the following resolution :—

That this Conference be now adjourned, and that it be referred to the general committee to prepare and publish a public report of the proceedings, with a selection of the papers, and determine as to the time and place of its next meeting

Mr. C H. Bracebridge seconded the resolution.

An amendment, proposed by the Rev. G. S. Bull, of Birmingham, was subsequently withdrawn ; and the resolution proposed by the Bishop of Sodor and Man was agreed to.

Thanks were then voted to the Earl Granville and to Mr. Cowper (who presided during the latter part of the day), and the Conference then adjourned.

REGISTRATION OF TITLES TO LAND.

To transfer the produce of the soil—be it agricultural, metallic, or mineral—from the vender to the purchaser is a perfectly facile operation ; but to transfer the land itself is a most costly, dilatory, and vexatious operation. Many years have elapsed since the complicated evils of our system of conveyancing attracted public attention ; but when the subject was investigated, with a view to reform acknowledged and glaring abuses, the difficulties appeared of such appalling magnitude that the boldest retreated with dismay from attempting the Herculean labour. The impediments thrown in the way of a searching inquiry were numerous. It was resisted by all who object to any change in what is established, from a vague fear that the remedy might prove even more pernicious than the disease. Possessors of estates who suspected some flaw in their title stood aloof, lest the flaw might be incidentally detected ; others who had deeply burdened their properties with mortgages and other incumbrances ; dreaded any possible disclosure of their poverty or improvidence ; while professional men who had passed their lives in studying the mysteries of the law became alarmed lest the adoption of plain rules and simple forms should deprive them of their emoluments. If these fears and prejudices have not yet entirely passed away they have become enfeebled, nor are they so widely diffused. The most timid have begun to learn that freedom of exchanges need not be regarded with apprehension ; that an obstructive policy is not protective, but destructive ; and that the law of progress, sooner or later, will enforce obedience to its decrees.

In the earliest periods of our history the most open publicity was given to the transfer of land ; but in the course of time that rule was weakened and finally abandoned. Subtle constructions and contrivances were introduced into the art of conveyancing, and the more the process became complicated the stronger became the disposition to execute them in secret. The cost of investigating titles increased, and legal difficulties gradually intervened to such an extent as to diminish the marketable value of real property. The evil at length became so notorious that the Select Committee of the House of Lords appointed to inquire into the burdens on land expressed themselves anxious "to impress on the House the necessity of a thorough revision of the whole subject of conveyancing, and the disuse of the present prolix and vexatious system." They also recommended "the improvement of the law of real property ; the simplification of titles and of the form of conveyances ; and the establishment of some effective system in the registration of deeds."

On the 15th of last May the Commissioners appointed on the 18th January, 1854, published their Report on Registration of Titles with Reference to Facilitating the Sale and Transfer of Land. It is a bulky document of 457 folio pages, replete with learned research, manifesting the most patient industry, and containing the most carefully-weighed considerations. Of its more essential points and bearings we propose to present to our readers a condensed summary.

Under the existing law there are five leading and distinct forms of registration. 1. A register of incumbrances and securities for debt. 2. A register or enrolment of particular classes of deeds, or of deeds having particular objects. 3. A register of memorials from the abstracts of deeds and instruments. 4. An enrolment of the deeds themselves, or full copies of them, extending to all deeds. 5. A thereunto, or full copies of them, extending to all deeds. 5. A register of the title or actual ownership, independently and irrespectively of the past transactions or deeds by which it has been acquired. The first four are special forms of conveyance, which lawyers alone can draw up, interpret, and understand, but the fifth is a very simple proceeding of this character is the register in the books of the Bank of England of the public stocks and funds. On these modes of securing titles the Commissioners make the following remarks :—

If the 4th of the above-mentioned systems were made to extend to the whole country, it would be what is termed a General Register of Assurances, and would supersede the 2nd and 3rd. If the 5th of these systems were extended to land, or if a register upon similar principles were applied to the ownership of land, it would exclude, or, at all events, might be made to render superfluous the 2nd, 3rd, and 4th systems, and with the addition of suitable provisions) the 1st also

After explaining the present state of the law as affecting landed titles, the Commissioners proceed to exhibit its evils, which, in the main, are attributed to the want of a complete registration-office, where the deeds, expressing the title, might readily be inspected. Under the present system it is easy to suppress or mutilate a deed, and thus fraud may be perpetrated. A man may feel himself safe by holding [illegible] estate, but be unexpectedly dispossessed by [illegible] of the legal estate. Thus it happens [illegible] titles are [illegible] marketable and desirable [illegible] Again, the Commissioners observe that deeds [illegible] no permanent evidence of the contents of the lost deeds. They point out the difficulty of "obtaining the production of deeds which relate in common to two or more estates, or to the divided estates of an estate which was once entire. [illegible] these causes also estates are rendered unmarketable. In the second Report of the Real Property Commissioners is the following paragraph :—

We believe it may be confidently asserted that of the real property of England a very considerable portion is in one of these two predicaments—either the want of security against the existence of latent deeds renders ordinarily unsafe a title which is yet marketable, or the want of means of procuring the formal requisites of title renders unmarketable a title which is substantially safe.

Statements of this character, coming from the highest authorities in the law, would at any time, and under whatever circumstances, demand a searching inquiry and a judicious reform ; but, since the repeal of the Corn-laws, and the greater attention paid to the processes of agriculture consequent upon that happy event, the policy of removing all impediments to the transfer of land has become more urgent. Security of tenure is one of the prime elements of value ; and whatever hinders those improvements which unrestricted competition is calculated to stimulate must prove of serious detriment. No man will invest capital on a doubtful guarantee, and the Report before us must inspire the most carelessly confiding with distrust ; hence a speedy remedy is most desirable. Moreover, we have only to reflect on the results of the Encumbered Estates Act in Ireland, not the least important of which is the new Parliamentary franchise to the soil, to appreciate the utility of a simple and inexpensive form of registration. At present, before a single acre can be sold, a detailed history of every transaction connected with the estate during a period of sixty years must be shown, or no lawyer would recommend his client to purchase ; and this retrospective search is to be in the house of almost endless expense, delay, and uncertainty. No legislator founding a new State would introduce such a system. The Commissioners put the vexation in a strong light by stating that before the owner of an estate can borrow one hundred pounds for his improvement he is forced to prove "every birth, marriage, death, settlement, charge, conveyance, or incumbrance, that might by possibility affect the title for more than half a century past." Why should not such a man have the same facilities of raising money by loan, or of effecting an absolute sale of his property, as the shipowner, fundholder, or owner of railway shares?

In the reform now contemplated the objects aimed at are—1, Security of title ; 2, Simplification of the title ; 3, A record of the actual ownership ; 4, Simplification of the forms of conveyance and general facility of transfer. That form of register which best compasses these conditions substantially, even should it fail to remove all technical objections which a very moderate share of ingenuity can raise, ought to be accepted. Or, to put the problem to be solved in the language of the Commissioners, "By what means, consistently with the preservation of existing titles, can we now obtain such a system of registration as will enable owners to deal with land in as simple and easy a manner, as far as the title is concerned and the difference in the nature of the subject matter may allow, as they can now deal with moveable chattels or stock ?" Among the improvements to be derived from the new system of registration, it is proposed that a retrospective inquiry into former transactions may be avoided without unduly impairing the security of trusts and settlements ; that the register should preserve the succession of simple transfers only, and denote the actual ownership for the time being, but not disclose past dealings ; that beneficial interests, not amounting to the fee, but creating minor interests and incumbrances, should be inserted in a separate and distinct register. For the whole kingdom a central registration-office is proposed to be located in London, with county offices for the several subdivisions of the realm—the whole under the control of the metropolitan registrar-general. Every owner of land in fee would have the right of recording his estate in the office ; and an intending purchaser would at once be able to inspect the nature, and ascertain the validity, of the title. A lender of money would be secured by assessing the certificate of registered ownership as firmly as he now is by the possession of title deeds under deposit. When incumbrances are created they must be so entered on the register "as to show the name of the owner thereof, the lands upon which the same is made, the amount of money secured thereby, the rate of interest payable thereon, and the date of the instrument by which it is created." The priorities of all charges are to be determined exclusively according to the dates of their respective registration. If a transfer of registered ownership is obtained by fraud, the proof of the fraud is to defeat the title of the person who thus becomes registered owner.

Whether maps form the best basis for a registration scheme has led to much diversity of opinion ; and the enormous expense of such instruments, based on triangulation, has been held as an insuperable objection, though without doubt they best preserve permanent landmarks, as a pictorial representation of property Mr. Blamire says that the maps and references in the Tithe-office have already cost as much as £2,500,000. The Commissioners do not insist on them as compulsory, but would leave it to the discretion of the owners to determine "how far and under what circumstances any existing public maps might be made available, as well as the scale upon which either the private maps or copies of the public ones should be prepared and employed."

We have not attempted more than an outline of this delicate and difficult reform. On the details and on the machinery much diversity of opinion may be expected ; but few, if any, can defend the evils of the present system, which mainly flow from the reminiscences of feudalism and the subtle devices of the mediæval age. Wisdom always seeks to readapt the ancient institutions which have outgrown their usefulness in a conservative spirit, not ruthlessly to destroy the old framework. In the Report before us we see an anxious and prudent desire to spare the old building, but to remove its decaying timbers ; to renovate, not to demolish.

INTRODUCTION OF THE ALPACA SHEEP INTO AUSTRALIA.—Mr. Titus Salt, of Saltaire, near Bradford, has succeeded in introducing the valuable Alpaca sheep into the colony of South Australia. The woollen manufacturers of Australia have made many attempts to accomplish this object, but the jealousy of the Peruvian Government (in whose country the animal is only found) has hitherto opposed successful barriers to the project. Mr Salt, who was the first to demonstrate that the wool of the Alpaca could be worked up into a woven fabric, had succeeded in obtaining a small flock of the animals, and had naturalised them upon a farm near Bradford. He had also a flock of Angora goats, and a flock of sheep, near Bradford. He had also a flock of Angora goats, and a flock of sheep, the wool of which is very valuable, being sold at the rate of 2s. per lb Some months ago Mr. Salt consigned a number of them to an agent at Port Lincoln South Australia, and on the 15th of March they were all landed in prime condition at Adelaide. They were thence shipped to Port Lincoln, with the view to their being placed in demand in the worsted districts. The weight of a fleece is said to be from ten to twelve pounds, and in its raw state the price per pound varies from 2s. 6d. to 4s. The sheep in its raw state the price per pound varies from 2s. 6d. to 4s. The sheep are reported animals thrive and increase, the advantages to Australia will be immense, inasmuch as a new staple of ready sale will be the result. Port Lincoln, where the experiment is to be tried, is understood to possess peculiar advantages. It is said to be a scanty crop of grass, peculiar advantages. It is said to be a scanty crop of grass, but it yields a variety of bushes, of which sheep are very fond, and on which they fatten. In its climate, the aridity of its pastures, and the nature of the ground, it very much resembles Peru, the habitat of the Alpaca.

THE LAST MORMON HEGIRA.—The Alton Courier, May 21, gives the following account of the departure of Mormons from Illinois :—"The Mormons of Alton have all left, they and Nauvoo, for the Upper Missouri, thence to take their weary march across the plains. The most of them intend to go to a new region of the Salt Lake country, some two hundred miles from the Great City—to "the wilderness," as they term it and there found a new town. A small number, only, go to the city of Brigham Young. The latter band started from here one hundred strong. The Peru Chronicle says that one day last week over 300 Mormons passed through that place on their way to Salt Lake City. We notice by the Rock Island papers that about 300 passed there about the same time, destined for the city of accumulations. The "Outpost of Zion" at Chicago, has been cleared out by the citizens, and will shortly be on its way to Salt Lake City, several hundred strong. The Cleveland Plaindealer of a recent date says that about 2500 will leave that city this spring, for the same place."

THE Rev. John Bowen, Rector of Orton Longville, near Peterborough, has been appointed Bishop of Sierra Leone.

AT the Thames Police Court, on Saturday last, Henry Lewis owner of the ship Aeron, was fined £20 for proceeding to sea without a proper certificate, contrary to the Merchant Shipping Act. The defendant had evaded the law by hiring a man who had a certificate to clear the ship out of Cardiff, and dismissing him as soon as that object was accomplished. He had also proceeded to sea without a properly-qualified mate.

GRASSI'S SCREW LOCOMOTIVE ENGINE FOR ASCENDING STEEP GRADIENTS ON RAILWAYS.

THIS invention, which has been patented by M Grassi consists of an application of the Archimedean screw to locomotive engines for taking trains up steep ascents on railways, which it is anticipated will prove more economical than the ordinary system of tunneling and embanking. Captain Moorsom, civil engineer, member of the Institution of Civil Engineers in London, and lately selected by the English Government to discharge the important and difficult duty of making a general survey for a complete railway system in Ceylon, has undertaken to study the Grassi system, and to report on its practical value. Captain Moorsom proposes to construct a locomotive engine with 15-inch outside cylinders, 4-feet driving-wheel, and 24 inches stroke, with boiler capacity sufficient to provide steam (with proper expansion gear) for a speed of not less than twelve miles per hour on the incline, with a gross load of not less than 100 tons, including the weight of the engine and tender, which would probably amount to about 28 tons. On the driving-axle of the engine a bevelled wheel will be fixed so as to connect by means of one intermediate motion with the crown-wheel on the end of the shaft of the screw. The driving-wheel and screw revolve in exact ratio to each other, so that the screw will advance exactly as the driving wheels advance, or, in other words, each revolution of the driving-wheel sends the screw forward 12 feet to 7 inches nearly. Thus, twelve turns of the screw are made for every turn of the driver. Captain Moorsom believes that the wheel will make about [illegible] such revolutions per hour on the level and that when we apply the same motive power to turn the screw on the incline of one in twenty the steam power will overcome the additional resistance arising from gravity and friction of the machinery, at a speed not less than from one-third to one-half of that attained on the level with the same load. The thread of the screw will be of 13 inches diameter, winding round a cylinder or shaft of 7 inches diameter, and with a pitch of 12½ inches. The cylinder screwed will be about 5 feet 4 inches long, and will always hold two of the rollers in its grasp at one time. The rollers or pulleys will be about 5 feet 4 inches long, and will always hold two of the rollers in its grasp at one time; they will be placed 3 feet 2 inches part from centre to centre, and will be about 8½ inches in diameter, and will revolve into a longitudinal balk of timber, and will be lubricated in the same way as the wheels of the carriages. The bearing timbers for the rollers will be a single line of balks about 10 inches wide by 8 inches deep; thus each mile will require 2933 cubic feet of timber, and 1668 rollers. The rails will be bridge rails, weighing 65lbs. per yard, and screwed to balks equal to a section of 10 inches by 8 inches at the least. The total cost per mile will be £3701. The cost of the engine (which will carry her tender upon her own frame), with screw and connecting gear complete, in the shops in England will be £3000. The rails have no additional expense to bear on account of this peculiar construction.

From the above it is obvious that a large economy is to be attained by the use of the screw-engine.

BRONZE CELTS DISCOVERED IN SURREY.

THESE interesting relics were found about the same time as the villa at Send, near Farnham, in Surrey. A labourer was digging up a piece of waste land for the purpose of planting it with trees, when a number of celts were discovered lying close together about twenty inches from the surface. They comprise a variety in bronze, such as were used by the ancient Britons, from the rudest form down to the most elaborately-finished weapon. The spot where they were found is about fifty yards from an ancient British camp called "Soldier's Ring," and about a quarter of a mile from a high intrenched hill called Crookabury Hill. From a considerable number of celts being found lying together they are thought to have been buried for concealment, in the hope of their possessor regaining them on a future day. Here they have remained for nearly 2000 years, some of them so little injured by time that the marks of the mould in which they were cast are still fresh upon them.

THE ACCIDENT ON THE LONDON AND SOUTH-WESTERN RAILWAY—RESCUED FROM THE CANAL.—SEE NEXT PAGE.

THE LATE FIRE AT THE CAMDEN-TOWN GOODS STATION

We have engraved upon the preceding page two scenes of this great conflagration, sketched from points which command favourable pictures of the destructiveness and vast extent of the catastrophe.

The first View shows the burning mass as it appeared from Prince's-road. About ten minutes before eleven o'clock the fire-engines began to arrive in rapid succession; but by this time the entire body of the building, five acres in extent, was one mass of flames the great gates were already gone—and in the centre could be seen waggon after waggon and truck-load upon truck-load of goods dropping down with a loud crash as the fire gained the mastery over them. The wind was at the time blowing in a south-westerly direction, the flames completely overlapping the roof of the Stanhope Arms and premises adjoining, notwithstanding the praiseworthy efforts of a Life Guardsman and some others, who in spite of the extraordinary heat continually threw buckets of water from the roof on to the front. The flagstaff on the summit of the building had already ignited and was blazing upwards when the brigade poured immense streams on the front of the building, which had become so hot that the water actually hissed, and the wall gave out copious clouds of steam as it dashed against it.

The large Engraving, sketched from the Canal, shows the fire in its full devastating fury.

In the interior of the burning warehouses beam upon beam and roof after roof came crashing down, and explosion after explosion added to the scene of devastation, which was not a little heightened when, at about half-past eleven o'clock, the roofs of the stabling, upon which the solid paving of the sheds was laid, and which were all supported upon arches to the extent of about two acres, gave way, carrying with them the whole of the burning mass beneath. Shortly after the great northern wall fell with a tremendous crash upon two large barges laden with corn which were lying in the cut of the Regent's Canal immediately beneath.

WHITSTABLE OYSTER-GROUNDS.

OYSTERS are out. True, indeed, now and then during the week two or three of the Essex or Kentish smacks steal up to Billingsgate, and find a ready market for their illegal freights; but the Londoners have forsaken mollusk-eating, and betaken themselves to Julien and Cremorne. From the 12th of May to the 4th of August dredging is forbidden, and, considering that at least fifteen thousand bushels are brought to the London market by one company alone, it is well that a little cessation of labour is forced upon the active jaws of oyster-loving humanity, and four months' respite granted to the oysters themselves to propagate their race. Notwithstanding their many troubles, how great holes are bored in their shells by curious interlacing sponges, how they are drilled by the trochi and whelks, and tickled by annelides and crabs (pinnotheres), they patch out their tormentors with pearly shutters, or they lay quietly submissive to their annoyances—models of patience—and don't trouble their heads—no, their brains, for they have no heads (and, indeed, not many of the latter)—about mundane matters, but boiling on the hard grounds in the fresh tide, twitter with the innumerable cilia of their beards armies of animalcules directly into their mouths, and get as fat as possible. Thousands of City people every summer take a "ride" over the salt waves to Herne Bay, within four miles of the largest oyster-ground in the kingdom—thousands eat them, but very few know anything about their lives or their histories. If any desire information it is very difficult to get it, and most content themselves with gulping a score or so of uncooked "natives," and expressing their satisfaction of the flavour by the oft-repeated ejaculation, "What delicious oysters!" Commons, roughs, and Jerseys are also abundantly consumed, with many gallons of porter and many cartloads of bread-and-butter, during the favoured months of the year—which oyster-eaters recognise by the presence of the letter R. The adage says he must have been a bold man who first swallowed an oyster, and truly he must have been a foolish one who, having tasted the first, did not try the second. Whether Adam had any ideas of oysters is not recorded, nor has the name of the first oyster-eater been preserved; but it must have been at rather a remote period of human existence that these excellent shellfish became a favourite dish. The Greeks had them at their suppers, and the Romans, we know, brought them to their tables from every shore. Juvenal declares the Roman epicure

> At the first bite each oyster's birthplace knew,
> Whether a Lucrine or Circean he'd bitten,
> Or one from Rutupinian deeps in Britain;

and as readily can a connoisseur or a dredgerman tell a Kent from a Colchester, a Jersey from an Irish, a Calais from a "New Ground," or a Kenkale.

Not knowing much more about oysters than most people, either of their habits or the mysteries of the trade, I determined to inform myself by a personal inspection, and resolved on a journey to Whitstable. Some people never find romance in anything like the author who was looking afterwards for a waggon while one was standing under his window—others find it everywhere—make it, in fact, as many do wit; and even an excursion to Whitstable might be made the subject of tales merry or serious. The bright sun was shining, and not a white fleck spotted the radiant sky; the tall spires and pinnacles of the old cathedral stood grey and erect above the green trees and red roofs, and pointed their beautiful fingers to heaven; above, the smoke curled with evident fascinate about the tops of chimneys, as if it were hard to be obliged to move off in such hot weather, and the wind was too lazy to stir up the fine dust that lay basking in the roads. But there were dark clouds on more than one heart in the city of Canterbury, and few on whose sympathies the shadows of the clouds had not fallen. A young and blooming maiden had been murdered by her lover, and was about to be consigned as dust—to dust. A drunken man had hanged himself—for three months he had been flushing away his senses, and on one of God's holiest and brightest days he had blotted out the lovely face of nature and cast himself into darkness. Other tales of human passions and wickedness, more subtle and more common, were poured into the ears of the traveller; and had digression been my digression, like the poet Lord's, I might have followed, novelist's path, instead of my journey to Whitstable. It used to be an event to get there; the six miles of railway or tramway was a slow way, and at the incline, by the tunnel, one could easily beat the train on foot, and walk over the hill enjoying the breeze while the passengers were being smothered with smoke within. The carriages are cleaner than they used to be, but some of them are still labelled "for Whitstable only," I suppose because they are too bad for anywhere else; and, although the time occupied in the journey is reduced to less than half an hour, the aboriginal arrangement of depositing passengers and goods alike on the harbour, among rails, rails, and waggons, is still in vogue. Sunday at Whitstable is a gay day; the town is a long winding street of small houses, stretched out with trees and gardens from Tankerton Point to Borstall-hill, like two lines of soldiers in single file, and all the inhabitants turn out in their best dresses to parade between them on Sunday evenings. These best dresses are not, however, the greatest attractions, at least of the fairer portion of the promenaders. Even the [illegible] even is not wholly unmoiseted. Primitive [illegible] the vanity of dress on Whitstable beach. Of [illegible] balks of timber these Primitive Methodist congregations [illegible], singing psalms and praying amongst the logs. A tea-booth was set up at the other end of the shore; and, though the indefatigable proprietor got some customers, the reverend primitive was in the great favour. Everybody in Whitstable seems happy—bright faces, tanned and weathered as well as young and [illegible] jackets and cotton gowns, silk mantles and black [illegible] over right hearts; and I only saw three dismal [illegible] the three primitives not the parson's; he was a comfortable-looking hard-working old man—but his clerk's and two assistants'. I suppose there's a fourth—the undertaker's, who probably has a long face to keep up appearances; but I firmly believe the gravedigger digs away as merrily as anybody, in the strong faith of universal enjoyment. The coke-ovens and the colliers do their best to make Whitstable dirty; and, if the South-Eastern Railway got riches in proportion to the quantity of filth about their premises, they would soon increase their dividends, and abandon their wish to have hand-bags of passengers by their excursion-trains, and permit them the luxury of an overall without the charge of tenpence for it. Off Tankerton Castle is a submerged way still known as the "Street Stones," which the full tide marks with a line of surf. At the end of it are the remains of an ancient town or station; and from a well-known ridge of rocks about six or seven miles from the shore quantities of red Samian ware, familiarly termed "pudding-pans," have been from time immemorial dredged up. Some are brought up in very excellent condition, and their abundance is remarkable. Over the water looms the Isle of Sheppy, the blue form of Warden Point resting on its bed of silvery mist in front of the ruddy sky and setting sun, whose rays make a golden path between the fishing-boats and barges as they travel eastwards, and land in gilded ripples among the rows of low jetties and old boats which worn-out sailors offer for hire at sixpence by the hour. Turning towards Herne Bay, a string of black dots indicates its mile-long pier; and as the salt water changes their chameleon hues from pale azure indistinctness to a mellow tinge, splitting into scales of green and purple as they make friends with the shore, they form lovely contrasts with yellow sands, verdant hills, and oolireous cliffs whereon the coastguard man, in "trousers white and jacket blue," paces up and down with spyglass now under arm, and now pointed with searching glance to look for smugglers who will never come, and again tucking up his glass to think of the prizes of other days when the magistrates somehow never convicted, and even the holy man read prayers in the village church with a clear conscience, although he had left his stable door open more than once in the week before. Common as is the oyster to naturalists and ordinary men, only one anatomical engraving of it exists, and in that the course of the alimentary canal is wrongly delineated. It is to be found in Poli's beautiful book on the testacea of Sicily, and the error has been copied into the splendid Crochard edition of "Cuvier's Regne Animal," while every one from Poli's day to the present seems to have preferred digesting the oyster to dissecting it, and much knowledge has yet to be acquired of the propagation of the oyster. The ovary is placed over the front and upper part of the animal, and covers nearly the whole body when distended with spawn, and it is this organ which gives the white appearance to the oyster in the spring of the year.

Many of the dredgers consider their flavour finer at this stage than during the ordinary season; but the public prejudice against them is not without its beneficial influences, though their prolificness is such as to preclude the idea of their extermination while there remains a favourable place in the wide sea for their development; each individual producing from fifty to sixty thousand eggs. When the eggs are liberated into the sea, each contains a small bivalve shell, imperceptible without the aid of the microscope, which escapes on the fracture of its little transparent capsule, and spins about rapidly for a time, and then attaches itself to some solid substance, on which it continues to grow and maturate. The "spat," as it is termed, is not the first nor even the second stage of development; the young oyster has then acquired its two shells, and become attached by one of them; and the idea is very prevalent among the fishermen that the brood swims, from their observations of the "fall of the spat" taking place at various distances away from the beds, and being apparently influenced by the conditions of tides and winds. The brood of the Whitstable oyster is considered to be carried by such influences to the Essex shore, where the spat falls in much greater abundance than on the Kentish side, and quantities of it are repurchased by the Whitstable dredgers to restock their own grounds. Not less than twelve or fourteen thousand pounds are thus annually expended by them. The oysters "sicken" about the end of May, and remain out of condition a few weeks, when they rapidly improve, and are again brought to market on that day (the 4th of August) of memorable note when their shells are built up in street corners, and halfpence eagerly solicited by shoeless children with the well-known "Please remember the grotto." The sickness is of two kinds—black and white—the colours being probably indicative of the difference of sex. oysters not being, according to M. Quatrefages, as has been frequently thought, hermaphrodite, but distinct. The two great divisions of the conchifera or bivalve molluscs are those possessed of siphons (siphonidæ) and those without (asiphonidæ). Of the former the common tellen, found by thousands in the mud of our coasts, and so ordinarily used in the pasteboard baskets, cottages, and other trifling ornaments of the humbler homes, is at once a ready and pretty example. A few of these placed in a pan of water exhibit a charming sight their long siphons extended like wax tubes with a flower or fluttering cilia at their extremities to defend the orifices from the intrusion of obnoxious objects, which are often seen whirling round and round in the moving circle produced by the inhalent and exhalent currents of water, the directions of which are made pleasingly evident by a scattering of powdered indigo or light dust. The oyster belongs to the siphonless order, and is also destitute of any foot, like the cockle; nor has it a true hinge, like most other shellfish. The branchiæ consist of the plated gills or lungs, commonly called the beard; the sheer transparent substance known as the "white" of the oyster being the powerful abductor muscle with which it closes its valves; and the small black clot which is usually extracted from the cavity between the latter organ and the body of the fish being the heart. The body itself consists for the most part of a highly-developed liver, easily recognisable by its olive hue, and the ovary—it may be regarded, indeed, as a natural paté de foie gras.

The summer's sun has woke long before the inhabitants of Whitstable have opened their eyes, or its houses their shutters both seem fast asleep together. All nature sparkles in the crisp air; even the chimneys of the coke-ovens look clean and bright. A few labourers trudge down the street singly and at intervals. Presently a blind is drawn—then another; a curl of smoke winds out from a solitary chimney; a child runs across the road with a cup; two or three women, with aprons twisted round their heads, open their doors and unclose their windows; gossiping boys begin to take down shutters and hook up awnings; early shoppers appear with the milkman, and the town rapidly awakens. Vanes at mastheads heave like a gentle sigh, and then drop listlessly down; sparrows chirp on house-tops, but not a feather is ruffled by the warm air. The wind is supposed to be—there's not a breath of it—west; if it "draws round to the east and" there will be a breeze; but it don't seem inclined to draw anywhere. The tide suits at eight o'clock, and at the appointed time the sailors assemble. They sit in the storehouses, whittling chips, sharpening knives on bricks and stones; some are astride the jetties, others are blown under the shade of buildings, and others bask on the shore. The foreman dredger directs his glass to Hartz Ferry, and detects by the rough surface a slight "draft" afar off, and afar off it keeps; it is watched for, and talked about, but it does not come. The men would have been dismissed long since but for the stranger; they are proud of their pretty fleet as it lies so quietly on the glassy sea, but prouder of it when sails are spread and the hundred boats are in motion, tacking and intertacking, and twisting about each other like creatures used to it from the days of their building. Early noon, and the breeze has died away. It is still looked for afar off by Hartz Ferry, but it is no longer to be seen. So a stentorian voice, round and full, issuing from the bell-tower, proclaims the master on the morrow at ten. Further back, the kingdom of ocean recedes, and the commonwealth of mud and mussels begins. Barges are high and dry; and as the coolness of evening sets in one scarcely recognises as we meet in the green fields the booted, guernseyed, sou'westered men of the morning in their holiday trim. During the night the breeze has come, and the barges at the end of the pier spreads her broad wings and departs on her way; the hundred fishing-smacks dance with delight; punts and small boats dance with joy; and the sharp waves popple round the horses' legs as they stand by their waggons alongside the barges—heavy things as they are, they, too, are inclined to be lively; oars, and spars, and sails are brought down the "full;" small boats tugged afloat crowded with men, and transfers of parts of their living freight made to other craft; more and more punts and sails skipping over the merry water. The smacks are boarded, foresails hauled up, jibs set, tillers rigged, pumps tried, and leak got [illegible] with a curious apparatus—a compound of a rocker, a broomstick, and a crosstree; baskets got ready; and three dredges fall from each vessel with a splash; their lines are made fast by little pieces of twine called "scops" at the proper lengths, and the three hundred dredges of the hundred smacks are all scraping the oyster-grounds together. The dredges are drawn up, the bags held up by their wooden beams, and the contents shot on deck. The dredges are launched again, and go scraping on as before, but the three sailors are hard at work astride their baskets selecting the larger oysters, weeding out the starfish, whelks, and dead shells, and scooping overboard the balance of "spat," young ones and culloh. What hauls for naturalists, what collections for aquaria are brought up at every cast! long stems of sponges, odoriferous bunches of weeds, old shells fretted with barnacles and peppered with their broad, flower-headed tubularia, horny fronds of sertularide and other bryozoa, the jelly-like spawn of the doris, the twisted cords of the sabs, and occasionally some of the nudibranchiates themselves, "dog whelks," "whelk tingles," "borers" and "burrs," "five fingers" and "twelve fingers," and dead and living things enough to give a zoologist years of work if he would only make up his mind to know all about them. The whelks are eaten or used as bait, the starfish supply the farmer with manure, and the rest are thrown overboard, as I said before. The selected oysters are allowed to remain on deck, the liquor within their shells protecting them from harm, while the influence of the sun and atmosphere destroys the parasitical weeds and animals with which the exterior of the shell is covered. Dredging is always an exciting operation, but it is not when the oysters are being dredged for the London markets that the most exciting scenes occur: these happen when they are out of season, or during the four months they are prohibited by law from being captured for sale. It is during this time the beds are "cleaned," that is, the whole of the grounds are swept from end to end, and all the oysters examined in the manner above described. Various portions are marked off by tall fir poles forty feet long, with the top brush of boughs remaining; these have their larger ends sharpened to a point, and are stuck into the ground, and worked down by the crew to a depth of eight or ten feet, when they are sufficiently firmly planted to resist the winds and tides. In each of these areas certain oysters are kept—commons, roughs, and natives; so the practice of throwing the remainder of each dredgeload overboard leaves each kind on its own particular ground. A large space is marked off at one end of the grounds for the deposit of all the oysters of more than three years' growth, and from this portion only the trade supply is obtained.

It is here the closing and finest scene of a dredging-day occurs. After about four hours' work the signal is given by the hoisting of a flag, and all the dredgers simultaneously cease from their labours, the boats make for the "Slouk," as this particular site is called. The hundred boats approach this limited space, and buzz about like flies within the narrowest of circles, the oysters are thrown over, the smacks return to their moorings. Each selects its own buoy, for the ends of the cables are attached to hollow casks, and are cast off when the vessel sails, and secured again on her return to her station—the trouble of heaving the anchor at every voyage being thus avoided. The punts are again at work conveying the dredgermen ashore. The sails and oars are carried up the beach and deposited in the stores, the dredging for the day is over, and the men go home to clean themselves, smoke their pipes, and, if the weather suits, literally to go over the same ground again on the morrow. The hundred vessels are once more deservedly riding with their bowsprits all in one direction, and are left with the oysters under the charge of the watchman and his crew. During the season a few of the most capacious boats are selected for conveying the oysters to town, whence, in addition to the consumption in the great city itself, many hundred bushels are sent abroad, large consignments being made even to America and Russia. The method of packing them is by arranging them in concentric rings, with the deep valve downwards, in common light casks, the heads of which are then nailed on, and in this way, living entirely on their own moisture, they are transported on journeys of more than a fortnight's duration. The exportation of oysters for long distances is not solely a modern accomplishment. Apicius, so famous for his ragouts, was also celebrated for his method of preserving oysters, which he contrived to send fresh five hundred leagues. The Romans appear to have eaten them generally fresh. Lucrius Arcasa built a house on the Lucrine lake for the purpose of eating them in the best possible condition, and in the neighbourhood of the Roman castra and villas heaps of oyster-shells are continually found. Cæsar even is reputed to have been tempted to the conquest of our land by the size of British pearls.

A dish of "natives," slightly flavoured with lemon, and a dust of sugar, accompanied by a bottle of chablis and the proper et cetera, is a lunch for a prince, but oysters are more usually eaten with the humbler accessories of vinegar and stout. They have not, however, been neglected by the votaries of culinary science, and are scalloped with bread crumbs, baked into patties, and served up with codfish as sauce. With our ancestors, too, they were greatly in favour, and although it would be difficult to get a modern cook to attempt any of their receipts which have been preserved, yet one or two may not prove unentertaining. The two following are from an old roll of the master-cook of Richard II., who, from his experience of that Monarch's luxurious feasts, ought to have been a first-rate hand. But tastes differ. "Oysters in Gravey. Schyl oysters, and seeth them in wyne and in thare own broth. Cole (strain) the broth through a cloth: take almonds blanched, grynde them, and drawe (mix) them up with the self (same) broth, and alye it with floer of rys (rice), and do (put) the oysters thereinne. Cast in powdor of gynger, sugar, macys; seeth it not to stondyng (not till it is thick), and serve forth. Oysters in Cyves.—Take oysters, parboil them in their owne broth; make a lyor (mixture) of crust of bread, and drawe (mix) it up with the broth and vynegar, mynce onyons, and do (put) thereto with herbes, and cast the oysters thereinne, boile it, and do (put) thereto powdor fort (pepper) and salt, and messe (serve) it forth." The following way "to make oysters in bruet" occurs in another document of the year 1381. "They schul be schullyd (shelled) and (and poached) in clene water, grynde peper, safron, fred, and all, and temper it with broth; do (put) the oyster thereinne, and boyle it, and salt it, and serve it forth."

About sixty species of recent, and more than two hundred species of fossil oysters are known. Of the former, many kinds are eaten in Chile, Virginia [illegible] and [illegible] the choicest large kinds of the latter are met with in the tertiary sands of the Isle of Thanet, and in the ragstone at Hythe, and other localities of the lower greensand. There is a narrow band of the Kimmeridge clay, composed of myriads of the tiny Ostrea virgula, a bushel of which would have scarcely afforded a meal; while the great shells of the Kentish rag and the native-like forms of the solitary oysters of the chalk make us regret there were no oyster-eaters in those days; and, in the words of the late Professor Forbes, one can scarcely look upon the scenes which ancient geology has unfolded without "chasing a pearly tear away" at the thought how all these delicate beings came into the world and vanished to so little purpose.

MONSTER COTTON-SPINNING ESTABLISHMENT IN RUSSIA.—A letter written from St. Petersburg on the 8th June says:—"The Residence of a monster manufactory has just been laid. It will comprise a cotton-spinning establishment and a series of weaving-shops. The building is to be raised upon the Isle of Cronsholm, near Narva, situated upon the Narova between the two cataracts of that river. It is stated that the spinning department alone will comprehend the immense building in the whole world. There are to be 1872 window-frames; and the building will be lighted by from 15,000 to 20,000 jets of gas. The number of workmen engaged is fixed at 3000 at least. The edifice is to be completed in three years, but a portion of the spinning department is to be ready for work in one year."

LADIES AT PUBLIC DINNERS.—The annual festival of the British Benefient Institution (a society for granting annuities to the widows and orphan daughters of members of the learned professions, in addition to the several annuitary), which took place at the London Tavern on Friday (yesterday), was illustrated by a delightful novelty in the usual arrangement of a public dinner. The lady patronesses of the society were present at the banquet with their husbands—not, as heretofore, in the galleries spectators of the feast, but sharers in it.

THE South-Western Railway Company have arranged to carry passengers between the Nine Elms and Waterloo stations at eight in the morning and at half-past eight in the evening) for one penny. This is designed with the special object of accommodating the large body of artizans employed on the London side, thus affording the opportunity of escaping the crowded streets, to the enjoyment of purer air and cheap rents.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

NEWLY-INVENTED GUNS.

Lord PANMURE (in reply to a question from Lord Ravensworth) said that the six guns constructed so as to be loaded at the breech had been imported from America. The order was given to the person who was an American, and was allowed to make them where he pleased, as they were experimental guns.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, with an appropriate explanation, introduced eight bills which had been prepared by the Statute LAW Commission for the codification of the law. These related to larceny, including burglary, malicious injuries to property, forgery, offences relating to the coinage, the game laws, libel, and the laws relating to accessories to offences. He described the principles by which the Commissioners had been guided in their important and arduous labours; and believed that, as the result of their work, the fifty volumes of statutes would be ultimately reduced to two or three.

Lord BROUGHAM and Lord CAMPBELL joined in the approbation expressed of the Commission, and the bills were read a first time.

MINISTERS' MONEY.—Their Lordships went into Committee upon the Ministers' Money (Ireland) Bill; Lord Derby coming up himself with a message from the Queen, and throwing the whole responsibility of it upon the Government. Notwithstanding several protests and much expressed disapprobation, the bill went through committee.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

THE ROCHDALE ELECTION PETITION.—PRIVILEGE.

Colonel FRENCH drew attention to the course pursued by the Select Committee appointed to examine certain parties relative to attempts made to bribe other parties to absent themselves from giving evidence before the Rochdale Election Committee, and complained that the Select Committee had converted themselves into a secret committee. He wished to ask the Speaker if a Select Committee had the power or thus turning itself into a secret committee without any order from the House to that effect?

Mr HENLEY said the Committee thought the ends of justice and the objects of the House would be best carried out by conducting its proceedings in private; and the members who were present acknowledged the justice of the discretion exercised by the Committee, in retiring from the room, where they had certainly the right to remain.

The SPEAKER said there could be no doubt as to the rule. Members of the House had a right to be present at all Select Committees unless directed by the House to be secret. In the present instance they had not been excluded they were only told the public service would be best attended to if they retired.

OATHS BILL.

On the order of the day for the consideration of the Oaths Bill, as amended,

Mr S. FITZGERALD moved a series of clauses, with the view of excluding Jews from the office of Lord Chancellor and some other offices of State, similar to the clauses of a like nature in the Roman Catholic Relief Act, and said that it was unnecessary to make any observations on the subject, as he understood that the Government would not oppose the introduction of the clause.

Lord PALMERSTON said that the Government had introduced no such clauses in the bill, believing that it would be taking safeguards against almost improbable contingencies. He was very desirous the Oaths Bill should pass, and he would not oppose the clauses, for, though unnecessary, he did not think them otherwise objectionable.

Sir F THESIGER said he would be no party to these clauses, because he would be no party to the Oaths Bill in any shape.

The Marquis of BLANDFORD said the adoption of these clauses would not prevent his taking the sense of the House against the third reading of the bill.

Mr NEWDEGATE said the bill now presented a singular aspect, for it declared the Jews eligible to make laws, but ineligible to administer them.

After some remarks from Mr. BENTINCK and other hon. members,

The clauses were agreed to, and the bill was ordered to be read a third time on Thursday.

SUPPLY.

The House then went into Committee of Supply, and passed a large number of votes belonging to the series of Miscellaneous Civil Services, amidst a prolonged discussion.

REFORMATORY SCHOOLS.

Sir G. GREY moved the second reading of the Reformatory Schools Bill.

Mr. ALCOCK objected on account of the lateness of the hour.

The House divided—For the second reading, 154; against it, 6.

Sir B. HALL, in reply to a question from Colonel French, stated the nature of the arrangements made for the accommodation of the members of both Houses of Parliament at the distribution of the Victoria Cross on Friday, the 26th.

Mr. LOWE obtained leave to bring in a bill to amend the law relating to Joint-stock Banks.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

Lord BROUGHAM laid upon the table a bill for the discouragement of vexatious litigation, and explained its provisions.

Earl GRANVILLE, in reply to a question from the Duke of Newcastle, stated his opinion that there was no doubt of the recent exploring expedition into the interior of Australia, and promised that all the information obtained should be laid before the public.

The Joint-stock Companies' Act Amendment Bill was read a second time.

DIVORCES.

The Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Bill was read a third time.

Lord REDESDALE moved a clause to the effect of restricting the Court of Matrimonial Jurisdiction from granting divorces a vinculo; but after a short discussion, the clause was negatived by a majority of 31 to 34.

The LORD CHANCELLOR moved an amendment restricting the penalty upon defendants found guilty of adultery to fine, and not fine and imprisonment. The amendment was carried by a majority of 43 to 29.

The Bishop of OXFORD opposed the motion that the bill do pass; but, on a division, the bill was carried by a majority of 46 to 25.

The Catholic Charities Bill was read a second time.

The Smoke Nuisance Abatement (Scotland) Bill was read a third time and passed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

FINSBURY PARK.

On the order of the day for reading the Finsbury Park Bill a second time,

Mr. W. WILLIAMS said it was unjust to tax the whole of the metropolis for the exclusive benefit of Finsbury, and moved, as an amendment, that the bill be read a second time that day six months.

Mr. COX supported the bill, which led to considerable discussion, in the course of which it transpired that Government had undertaken to ask Parliament to make a grant of £50,000 towards the £350,000 which the park was to cost, the balance to be raised by a rate on the metropolis, which it was assumed would not exceed one farthing in the pound. Very strong objections were made to the application of public money to local purposes, and it appeared as if the bill, which was the first production of the Metropolitan Board of Works, would have been defeated, when

Sir B. HALL came to the rescue, and suggested that the opinion of the House should be taken on the propriety of the grant of £50,000 by moving the adjournment of the debate; all who were for the adjournment being declared to be opposed to any grant of public money for the purpose.

Mr. MILES adopted this proposition, which he thought had much reason in it, as there was no wish to defeat the bill. He accordingly moved the adjournment of the debate.

After a somewhat stormy discussion the House divided, and the motion for the adjournment of the debate was carried by a majority of 214 to 123.

FISCAL AFFAIRS (IRELAND).

Sir D. NORREYS moved for leave to bring in a bill to provide for the management of the fiscal affairs of counties in Ireland by electoral boards.

Colonel FRENCH opposed the bill, as being no improvement whatever on the existing system.

A somewhat protracted and uninteresting discussion ensued, confined exclusively to Irish members, after which the motion was withdrawn.

CULTIVATION OF COTTON IN INDIA.

Mr. J. B. SMITH then moved the following resolution: "That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient that Parliament shall direct its immediate attention to the best mode of removing the obstacles which impede the application of British capital and skill to the improvement of the productive powers of India." The hon. gentleman adverted to the fact that in our industrial districts manufacture had overtaken production, and it became necessary to look out for fresh sources of supply. For the requisite supply of cotton India was the country which ought naturally to be looked to, but there was no encouragement to British capitalists to enter to supply themselves with the raw material. The resources of India was proverbially bad; there were no roads, and but little security for life and property, and no efforts had been made to correct the aridity of the soil by means of irrigation. The tenure of land in India was itself sufficient to check the British capitalist from attempting to bring into cultivation a soil which could be made to be very greatly productive. Except in Bengal, no man could hold an acre of land in fee-simple and under such a state of the law it was not likely that men would be tempted to embark their capital. He hoped the Government of India would hold out encouragement to capitalists by giving guarantees to them for making railways and other public works, and also by altering the tenure of land in that country.

Mr. TURNER seconded the motion, and bore testimony to the admirable quality of the cotton of India, if properly cultivated and cleaned.

Mr. MANGLES said the subject was a very large and important one, and very little understood. The hon. gentleman had in his speech been visiting the sins of former generations upon the present administrators of the Government of India. When the war broke out with Russia, England would have suffered severely from want of hemp, and other articles of Russian produce, had not India supplied the deficit; and India would be ready to supply all the cotton required by England, if those who wanted it would adopt the same course as had been taken with respect to hemp and oils. The Government of India had guaranteed the interest on £50,000,000 for the purpose of making railways, and had given land for the same purpose to the value of £1,300,000. Works of irrigation had also been promoted, and, in fact, the Company was doing all in its power to improve the condition of the country. The real reason for not growing cotton more largely was the discontinuance of demand for it.

Lord STANLEY contended that the absence of a continuance of demand for cotton was owing to the laches of the Indian Government in not having constructed means for its conveyance from the place of culture to the seaboard.

Mr. D. SEYMOUR defended the conduct of the Government of India.

Sir E. PERRY moved the adjournment of the debate.

The debate was then adjourned until Tuesday next.

The remaining business was then disposed of—several bills being advanced a stage.

UNPUBLISHED EARLY REPORTS OF DEBATES IN PARLIAMENT

THE Reports of Parliamentary Debates during the seventeenth century and in the first half of the eighteenth, still preserved in unpublished manuscripts, constitute a portion of the materials of our history not appreciated at its true worth. There are also contemporary tracts published, prior to the struggles of the printers in the last century to enforce the right of Parliamentary reporting—too little known, although they contain contributions from the debates of both Houses—towards our forming a correct estimate of important measures and leading events. The fortunate discovery of a few such reports in manuscript in the State-Paper Office will awaken serious attention to the subject. Those real reports of special debates in the House of Commons were made by one of its members—no less considerable a person than Addison, when he was the second time Irish Secretary. They are contained in letters for the eye of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (the Earl of Sunderland); and they will be found by no means the least interesting chapter among the new memorials of our great literary Statesman, the silent "Spectator," for which we shall be indebted to the promised edition of those memorials by Mr Bohn.

This discovery must open great treasures of a like character now locked up in many repositories, public or private, unreported; and the opinions and political habits of our forefathers will thus be exhibited in fresh and extremely interesting lights a little obscured by circumstances, yet easily cleared up.

Although modern reporting, like some other social benefits we now enjoy, really grew out of an old stock of good constitutional usages and established rights, our voluminous daily reports have tended to deepen the shade thrown over those usages and rights. So not only have the curt orations of F—x and B—e, stealthily set up in opposition to the timid speeches of the Minister Lord N—h, as if they were all newly arrived from Utopia, been eclipsed by those voluminous reports; but the present open practice of reporting has introduced a common notion that legitimate exact accounts of debates in Parliament are of exclusively recent use. The fact is far otherwise; and it is not necessary further to enter into a dry discussion about Parliamentary privileges or the inroads of the fourth estate upon it, to establish the point beyond all reasonable doubt. In fact, such privilege never forbade members to make confidential reports of all essential occurrences in Parliament—the proceedings, with their anecdotes, and especially their debates; and the records of the debates having certainly been numerous as well as free, in all the forms that confidential communications can assume, it is not too late to recover them to an appreciable amount. The strong disposition now universal for the production of all such records is exceedingly favourable to research in this promising field.

Two hundred years ago, as we learn from the positive testimony of Francis Osborn, "some of the peers even obtained leave for their sons to stand by the chair of state, and hear the debates—a laudable and most improving way of knowledge," which suggests a description of "the Paul's walking newsmongers" as a very curious record of the discoursing he himself diligently profited by. Four hours every day for nine months in the year (he tells us) did "the principal gentry, lords, courtiers, and men of all professions," meet in the north aisle of St. Paul's Church, to discourse of news and affairs of State."

The importance attached to the debates of those days is mentioned by Osborn. His record of the attempt of James I. to corrupt "all the popular and principal speakers;" and the House of Commons being, as he insists, "the pulse of the nation," it may be safely concluded that the debates were matters of deep and daily interest to the newsmongers, who communicated personally with the members of both Houses of Parliament. Tradition, in such storehouses would be a sure guarantee for the truths of the more striking details.

Above all things, before the last century, our forefathers were not so careless of their interests as to let the business done at Westminster pass away without some grave record, although their business was usually done with closed doors. Members were at all times free to publish their own speeches; and it was even the usage to enter the debates upon the journals as public documents. This is asserted broadly by Mr. Burke in the grand struggle of William Woodfall and his brethren in 1771, respecting the right to print the debates.

The Scottish Parliamentary practice—to which, on some capital points, we may still resort with advantage—was carried so far in the same spirit, that in Thomson's faithful collection of the statutes, the debates sometimes accompany the text of the laws themselves.

Mr. Burke always treated the previous Parliament of the Commonwealth, which well supported Cromwell in his giant rule abroad and at home. The former, among other merits, brought to light the germs of the vain labours of Burke to avert the severance of the American colonies from the mother country. The untimely price paid through the incapacity of the Colonial-office of that day.

Cavendish was a member of the House of Commons in 1771. His reports were in short-hand, learned for mere personal convenience; and he soon acquired so much skill in it, he says, that, from being with short notes, he was able to take the debates at large, except in the case of very rapid speakers, whom he could not possibly "keep up with." "Some imperfections," he admits, arose from his inconvenient situation when writing, and some arose from disorder in the House. "Many sublime and beautiful passages are lost," he fears, for ever. But he preserved much, and "never wilfully misrepresented the sentiments of any one member." The value of Mr. Cavendish's reports will be appreciated by the single fact, that he preserved at much length more than two hundred of Burke's speeches in the "unreported Parliament of 1771," as it has been designated. Burke used these notes of his famous speech upon American Discontents, afterwards published by himself with some corrections. It is to be regretted that the able editor of Cavendish's reports did not complete the publication of them.

"Horace Walpole's Letters" furnish many clever reports of debates at which he was present before Cavendish's time; and a Bishop of Oxford, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury (Secker) took careful notes of the debates in the House of Lords for the three years before the Rebellion of 1745. His manuscripts are deposited in the British Museum, as well as the reports taken by Cavendish.

In the same year (1745) appeared the reports of Auchitel Grey, a member of the House of Commons thirty years before and after the Revolution of 1688. The advertisement for their publication states, that the reporter was a person of distinction and strict honour. He was present at all the transactions which he relates, except a few cases mentioned to him by members whom he generally names. As he did not write his reports with a view to publication, he cannot be supposed, says the editor, to have added or suppressed anything by design. After the recent revelations by the Times, of the tenderness of their reporters towards second-rate Parliamentary orators, it is to be feared that so much cannot be said of our very best members of the Gallery now.

Boyer wrote his "History of Queen Anne's Reign" partly from genuine notes of the debates in Parliament:—"I have," he says, "ever had in view the observation of an ingenious and judicious foreigner (M. de St. Evremond), that he who sets about to write the history of England must write the history of Parliaments. Accordingly I have made it my business to relate the proceedings in Parliament, with such exactness as, I dare say, is not to be met with in any former historian. To this purpose, I have not only used the printed votes, which are in everybody's hands, but I have had recourse to the manuscript journals of both Houses. And I must own my obligations to several public-spirited members, who have either communicated to me many remarkable speeches on important occasions, or procured me opportunities of being an ear-witness to the debates."

These few notices exhibit the interior of Parliament as replete with sources of the best intelligence, and our libraries are not wanting in proof of the diligence and ability with which those sources of intelligence were habitually secured for the instruction of many. The British Museum is rich in such stores; and it may be expected that the spirit abroad which is thus prompting the lawyers to apply the new financial facilities to an improved system of reporting for all the courts of justice, will urge politicians and men of letters to turn the same facilities to account by organising a good plan for reporting the debates of our Legislatures, not excluding those of the Colonies; and even with an occasional glance at the British discussion in the Congress at Washington. The limited liability law-reporting companies will be excellent precursors to a debate-reporting company of the most excellent character; and such an organ of current debates in Parliament, rivalling, if not swallowing up, Hansard by its completeness and economy, would be able to look carefully over the past, and bring in all our old historical stores of this sort with great effect.

This company would contribute greatly to bring the heterogeneous elements of our widely-scattered countrymen into combined action; and when the national time shall be come for the severance from us without convulsions, they will have grown up with so many social characteristics in harmony with us, as to guarantee a future without conflict, or even jealousy.

VILLAGE SCHOOLS, EFFINGHAM, SURREY.

THESE schools, which are conveniently arranged for 100 children, with an industrial room and teacher's residence, form a picturesque block of buildings at the entrance of the village of Effingham. They are built with red brick and Bath stone dressings, and the grounds are tastefully laid out with lawn and flower garden in front, playground and outbuildings in the rear. Their architect was Mr. A. D. Gough, of Lancaster-place, London.

Effingham, a small village, beautifully situated between Leatherhead and Guildford, was once a large town, according to Manning and Bray's "History of Surrey," but is now a quiet agricultural place. The school was held in a coachhouse up to the time the present building was opened. The feelings and wishes of the late Mrs. Edgar P. Stopper show what can be done for the good of the poor and the benefit of a parish by a little thought; for, instead of a pompous funeral and the frittering away of money in tokens of remembrance to friends and relations, or leaving small legacies perhaps to those who did not require them, such amount has been rendered useful and advantageous, by obtaining with it the aid of a Parliamentary grant, in building that which was much needed in the parish. The circumstances were thus narrated in the sermon preached by the Vicar, the Rev. H. Malthus, on the opening of the schools

A noble Lord, a proprietor, though not a resident in our parish, has most liberally granted and secured to us a most convenient piece of land, upon which has been erected the building we now assemble in, and there may long be a blessing, to the whole village. But for the schools and house adjoining, for the fittings connected with them, and the pretty garden in front of all that portion of the expense which the proprietors and residents in the parish might fairly have been called on to raise—all this one thoughtful and affectionate heart has cared for, one liberal hand has provided. They are the free gift of one who well loved the home of her childhood and youth, the daughter of him whose memory we all must cherish as a kind and bountiful benefactor to this parish, who was for years its chief originator and support each charitable work. Charlotte Stringer lived and grew up amongst us in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. How many of us remember with what unaffected piety and gentleness she befriended her poorer neighbours—how, especially, her zealous desire to educate the young led her to establish an infant school on the hill, which was confided to her fostering care until her marriage!

How quickly scenes to have passed away those few years since you saw her united in this church to one also born and brought up in this parish, whose family, beloved and respected, long dwelt among you, until the sudden blow was struck which brought sorrow on the new home which she had blessed, and cut short the course of those labours of love to which her energies were still devoted! On this day twelve months we were again assembled in her early home and led by her father's side; and we were sorrowful, but not as others which had no hope, for we, too, seemed to hear as it were a voice from heaven saying unto us—"Even from henceforth, blessed are the dead which die in the Lord. Yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labours, and their works do follow them." Surely may we say in the words of St. Paul—"She being dead yet speaketh."

The virtues of the dead gain, perhaps, in the power of sanctity what they lose in the power of visible presence, and thus it may not be too much to say that the virtues of the dead benefit us sometimes as much as the examples of living goodness

I must now turn from those thoughts suggested by the Christian character of her to whom we owe this great gift to our parish to tell you of the aid afforded us from public grants.

The education which is given in our elementary schools is now gradually assuming a very improved character from what it was even ten or fifteen years ago This improvement is owing to several causes—to the effects of the different educational societies, and also of individuals, but mainly to the Committee of Council on Education, by their requiring the inspection of our schools, the apprenticeing of pupil teachers, the examination of masters and mistresses for certificates of merit, and the augmentation of salaries following up this; and in no little measure by their recommending and making known better modes of instruction, and better apparatus and class-books for our schools. Indeed, we must feel that the education of the country would have made but very little progress if it had not been for these measures. Let us see what share this our country parish has had of these benefits, and we will form some notion of the extent to which the cause of education is assisted and encouraged by Parliament throughout the whole land. I find in looking at the last published report that there has been granted to this parish, during the last ten years up to this Christmas—for books, for increasing the master's salary, for the apprenticeing of pupil-teachers, and for a capitation grant (which I will explain presently)—the sum of £411 12s.; and now, in addition to this, they have granted, in aid of the gift of our benefactress, an amount equal to that which they would have given if the funds had been raised by a general subscription throughout the parish, another sum, probably between £400 and £500. It is well to remind you, too, that this benefit has been secured without any exertions on our part; we have had no committee to form, no minute inquiries to fill up, no neighbourly correspondence to carry on, no estimates to make, no builders' contracts to superintend, no legal difficulties to overcome; all has been done for us, and the schools presented to the parish complete; by him who has so generously and affectionately fulfilled the last joint wish of himself and her whose memory he kindly cherishes. It now only remains for us to consider and determine what are our duties, and what shall be our conduct in this matter We have the school-buildings, house, and garden, provided for us; let it be our pleasure, as well as our duty and interest, to carefully preserve them from all injury, and to keep them in substantial and even ornamental repair. We have every aid and encouragement from the Committee of Privy Council; let us not throw away such advantages, but eagerly and thankfully avail ourselves of the benefit.

A handsome lending library, presented to the parish by Mr. Stringer, has since been lodged in the new school.

PLAISTOW NEW TOWN, OR HALL'S VILLE NATIONAL SCHOOL-CHILD.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH

PURSUIT OF KNOWLEDGE UNDER DIFFICULTIES; OR, A NATIONAL SCHOOL IN THE SUBURBS OF LONDON IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY

MANY of our readers are not perhaps aware that six miles east of the city of London there is a new town called Hall's Ville. It is in the neighbourhood of the Victoria Docks, and is situated in the parish of Plaistow, in a marsh adjoining the Thames, from which the tide is kept out by the embankment of the river. Every tide formerly flowed over this swamp, and it was not until lately that any one dreamed of building in such a situation; but since the formation of the new docks a large town has been commenced, and even now numbers its population by thousands. We hear much of sanitary boards and sanitary measures, but here is a district seven feet below high-water mark, formerly a peat-bog, but now covered for several feet with the silt of the Thames, and clothed with rich pastures. These marshes are only rendered fit for cattle by dykes or ditches to collect the surface water. There are no trees or fences; but the ditches form the boundaries of the several fields and properties. In wet weather the whole are flooded to the depth of many feet, and the district has the appearance of a large lake; some of the houses being dotted about like small islands. In this dismal swamp Hall's Ville has been built, without any attempt at drainage, and without any legal interference to provide either for the health or comfort of the inhabitants. There are no sewers, scarcely any paths, and the roads are so unformed that the parish will not take them up. They are in wet weather scarcely passable; being one or two feet deep in mire and filth, and are little more than the soil of the marsh trodden up. The ditches are in, around, between, nay, in some instances, even under the very houses, and are the only receptacles of all the sewage of the neighbourhood. Is it any wonder, then, the mortality under such circumstances is five times greater than in other parts of the same parish more favourably circumstanced? The only wonder is that people can live there at all. The inhabitants are chiefly the labourers in the docks, and some factories lately established on the banks of the river, and in habits and morality just what might be expected from persons living under such degrading influences. Such is the character of the place where the little school shed, the subject of the present notice, is built. We append an Engraving of this shed, which is, perhaps, the cheapest national school in the kingdom, and bears witness to the perseverance of the Incumbent of the parish, who has made the best use possible of the very limited means within his reach. A few statistics of this little school will be interesting, and should any of our readers wish to visit it they will be amply repaid for their trouble. The easiest way to it is by the North Woolwich Railway, from Fenchurch-street. It is in Hall's Ville-road, not far from the Barking-road station. While the docks were forming, and the population was larger than it now is, as many as 200 children were in attendance and on the books of the school at the same time; but, as the shed would not hold all, some were placed in a room in one of the adjoining cottages. As many as 120 children are now in constant attendance, and in every way do credit to the excellent mistress and her admirable teaching.

The school was opened in 1848, with eleven scholars; there were then only thirty inhabited houses in the place, yet the poor Incumbent of the parish, whose church is between two and three miles off, cared for these little ones. This school has been in debt from its commencement, though managed with the greatest economy. The mistress, who has sole charge, has only £35 a year, and is deserving of double the money. The shed is built on the unoccupied site of a house in an unfinished row in a very bad part of the town, and 3s. a week is paid for ground-rent; the shed has a lean-to roof, resting against the gable wall of a small grocer's shop; it is 30 feet long, 14 feet 6 inches broad; the extreme height of the roof where it impinges upon the supporting wall is 9 feet, at the eaves only 6 feet 6 inches. The sides and ends of the shed are composed of rough waste slabs, or boards cut from the outside of balks of fir timber, full of rents and shakes; the roof is of the same, covered with felt, now quite rotten. The only light is from the roof, in which two miserable sashes from an old greenhouse have been inserted. The glass is happily much broken, which, together with the rents in the boards, provides for ventilation. In cold weather this is quite sufficient for most people's feelings, in such a cold, damp, and bleak situation. In wet weather the mistress is literally obliged to keep school under an umbrella, for besides the broken glass the roof is far from water-tight. The whole cost of the school, including fixtures and furniture, was £14, and, being three years old, is nearly tumbling to pieces.

As before stated, the children have been well taught, and they have passed most satisfactory examinations, as testified by the Diocesan Inspector on more than one occasion. Moreover, for want of a better place, Church services were constantly held in this shed during the time that Mr. Marsh had a Curate. There was no other Church service in Hall's Ville; but this was obliged to be given up for want of funds, to the great grief of the earnest congregation which used to fill the shed to overflowing every Sunday. Our readers will not be surprised that this could not be continued when they are informed that Mr. Marsh, the Incumbent of Plaistow, in whose parish Hall's Ville is placed, with a private income of only £70 a year, gave £100 a year for two years and a half to the Curate out of his living, the value of which was only £180 a year. He could get no help, and his school was sadly in debt. To enable him to resume his Church services, in a more suitable building and with suitable help—in fact, to do the work of the Church as it ought to be done—the Plaistow and Victoria Dock Mission, on a large scale, has been set on foot. We are glad to learn that it is not intended to wait for costly churches or endowments for clergy, but to make the school accommodation as complete as possible, and to have in the schools short and attractive services from the Prayer Book, suited to the capacity of the untaught and very poor. They are to be school churches as well as church schools; music will be taught, and there will be instructive lectures on popular subjects. In short, it is intended to popularise the church, and to make it in reality the poor man's church. The plan has received the cordial sanction of the Bishop of London, and, at the earnest entreaty of the promoters of the Mission, his Lordship has kindly consented to select the right sort of earnest, devoted men, who are to live amongst the poor as the poor. We heartily commend the scheme to a Christian public.

BADGE AND CHAIN OF THE MAYOR OF SALFORD.

IT needs but a very slight acquaintance with mediæval metal-work to be aware that the corporate bodies of our old cities were great patrons of jewellers and silversmiths—as great, indeed, as the ecclesiastics themselves. Indeed, a large portion of fine specimens of plate and jewellery of the highest character belongs to our City companies; and it is to the preservation and exhibition of these precious relics that the present impetus and elevation given to goldsmiths' work may be attributed.

BADGE AND CHAIN OF THE MAYOR OF SALFORD.

Manchester has shown us what an Art Exhibition can be; and Salford is willing to rival her twin sister in taste, if not in the magnitude of her undertakings. We engrave above a Gold Chain and Badge, made for the Corporation for the purpose of being worn by the successive Mayors of Salford. It is, probably, as true and sound an instance of goldsmiths' work as has been made since the days of George Heriot. Every portion of it is well finished and massive, and the Badge is a very excellent specimen of heraldic enamelling. The arms, granted by the Heralds' College, are—azure a shuttle or, between three wheat-sheaves, and as many bees of the second, on a chief or, a bale of wool between two mill-rinds azure. The supporters are heraldic wolves. The motto—a very fit and appropriate one for a city which, though born of yesterday, occupies so proud a position as that of Salford—"Integrity and Industry." The Badge and Chain have been prepared by Messrs. Hunt and Roskell, of London.
